James Brown Scott gives an interesting paper showing how the influence of International Law.

We publish this morning the fifth of the Civic League articles, written under the auspices of the City Club and the courts of justices. Professor James Brown, solicitor of the Department of State, is on "Municipal Problems in the Light of International Law."

International law is an old and ancient subject. The law of nations has been developed from ancient historical and political changes. The law of nations is also called the law of the sea, and the right of every nation to govern itself. The law of nations is the branch of international law that is concerned with the rights and duties of states, nations, and individuals.

The exercise of the right of nations to govern themselves is the foundation of their independence. The law of nations is also concerned with the rights of states to govern their own affairs, and the rights of individuals to govern themselves. The law of nations is also concerned with the rights of states to govern their own affairs, and the rights of individuals to govern themselves.

INTERCOLLEGIATE CIVIC LEAGUE'S FIFTH ARTICLE

From these instances, taken at random, it seems that very often the law, as we understand it, does not by its very nature set up the rights and the duties of man. It might very well have been different. The law as a science as it is taught in universities is one of the greatest bankruptcies of human knowledge. It is in the immortal words of a great man, "The law was written on the tablets of stone."

We have seen how thoroughly international law and the rights and privileges of the individual are the same everywhere and that the law enters into the life of the American people. As citizens we must understand these questions, for as voters we pass upon them. It is true that in many cases the law is not as it should be. But to understand what the law is and how it affects the individual is one of the greatest responsibilities of citizenship. We must therefore make a study of the law and understand it in order to do our duty as citizens.
