THE PENNSYLVANIAN

The duties of the Editor of THE PENNSYLVANIAN are too well known for it to be necessary to say here that the entire undergraduate body did not clamor at our door for us to write the editorial in question. As it was written by one who thought he had heard enough of the same sentiment expressed by others to justify him to expressing it more than his own private opinion, namely, that there was not enough cheering and that silence at certain times gave a wrong impression. This paper is primarily intended to express undergraduate views, but the editor does not generally have time to convey all the 4,000 students at Pennsylvania, or even a majority of the thousand in the College, before advocating or criticizing.

If the statements made are the best advantage. Our object in criticizing is never other than to cause improvement, if possible.

We wish to add, in justice to our-, selves, that our views in regard to the cheerings remain unaltered and that there are at least a few who hold the same friendly opinion. We have merely tried again to convey the impression which our former editorial evidently did not convey. Above all we want it distinctly understood that we are always in closest sympathy with those who are loyal to Pennsylvania. If we are not understood now, it is because our use of the English language is not as proficient as it should be.
