One of the arguments to be advocated in favor of a general University Undergraduate Committee—a plan suggested in these columns some weeks ago—is the combination of interest that would probably result from such an organization. At the present time there is no official association of any kind between the men in the different departments, and class presidents in the College are not even acquainted with presidents in the professional schools, the representatives of large bodies of men. There is no harmony in preserving University ideals, organizing University plans or uniting University spirit.

While there are many men in the professional departments who are graduates of some other college, there are many who are not, and those men never come very closely into contact with what is known as college spirit, or else they conceive, and quite naturally, a different idea of it from that of the college man. We make a mistake in not utilizing for the common good of all the undergraduates the undeveloped spirit and interest of many professional school men. An example of undeveloped spirit is found in the fact that very few men, scarcely any in the Medical and Law Schools, find time or inclination to read their University daily newspaper, which contains considerable news of interest to them.

A University Undergraduate Committee could at least discuss ways and means of bringing the departments into closer harmony and perhaps some way of destroying the petty jealousies now existing between them. It surely looks as though the end in view justified an experiment even though it should later prove unsuccessful.
