THE ARTS

Dr. Sparta’s address before the Arts Association last week had an all too meager audience entirely aside from the body of his speech. The fact that the Arts Association has revived sufficiently to undertake an affair of its nature is an indication of a readjustment in audience attitude everywhere toward the so-called Arts and Science courses of ordinary instruction.

In recent years, the eagerness to set aside a special vocational course will that place before the admitting world has caused as many students to lose sight of the volume of culture in a liberal education. The specialization movement has been especially definite at Pennsylvania; and with its aggressive progress the Arts Department has been forced to keep itself aloof and uncommunicative in its discussion of the unscientific material of a student’s life. So sometime extreme actions of its younger and enthusiastic offshoots.

That a readjustment was necessary on the part of the student, the College has been apparent for some time.

Twentieth century ideals and needs must not be met by any department, to the world of the new and the old. The new departments are still in the experimental stage; Arts has often been in danger of becoming obsolete because it has clung too obstinately to the foundations that were not clastic at the time of their inception. Bases that were essential when universities first began to grow and develop have shifted with the times. And it is because of this that there have often been well-founded quarrels with the arts. But more serious than such purely academic thought and need is after all the essential thing in the college of today.

The Arts Association has been reconstituted this past spring on a plan that it can be of much service in furthering the same progress of liberal education at Pennsylvania. If the ambitions of the present generation are realized, it is safe to warn that artistic ideals will be relegated to the past in short order.

While a revised standard of values for the liberal arts will make the College Department more than ever essential to an education that is real in every respect.
