IN ANSWER. The student who signed himself "College" in the communication last Saturday's issue spoke with the voice of assurance. He outlined for us the privileges—and as we understand him, the obligations—of college education. He was sure of his ground. He prefaced his remarks with a reference to the return of students from the summer holidays. We felt that so far his premise justified the restatement of sentiment which college, from presidents to presidents, has been harping upon as long as we can remember.

Is his presumption justified? Is there indeed promise of better things in the making of the men now returning to school? Are these time-honored platitudes to be taken up with a new determination? Are we, in short, prepared to count more upon the value of our work and our activities? The answer is not self-evident, nor is it to be presumed at some consideration of what it involves.

Let us assume, for the sake of the argument, that the undergraduate will now come to the University with definite ideas of what the University owns him; or, perhaps, what he owes himself through the medium of the University. Somewhere as the war has clarified the world's ideas on international relations, it has clarified the relations between University and student. The student has become aware, at least in a general way, of the obligations and his opportunity of fulfilling them. He knows that when he leaves the University he must be well prepared, not merely to live, but to go to work or to go to college, but with a firm responsibility and a lasting foundation. The University must guide him on the road to this confidence, and while he will have to work out the phases of his own life, he must finally achieve by his own hard work. It is inevitable. He cannot safely measure his own failure in the record on the heads of those who merely also prefer to reject him. Let us assume that he is realistic and he is ready with a new strategy. This is a step in the right direction, and if the promise itself is a demonstration of his ability it is, at least in a general way, a demonstration of his ability to do what he has been told to do by his own hard work. It is inevitable. He cannot safely measure his own failure in the record on the heads of those who

They are now supplying services to the vicinity of Detroit, and are accommodating 3,000 patients.
