CREW AGAIN

A communication appeared in these columns yesterday which called our attention in an uncertain manner to the alleged existence of misunderstanding and thoughtlessness on editorial, published a few days ago, which introduced a suggestion which we thought might be of some use to the crew management. It appears that it did not achieve its purpose. That is, it turned us down as we did not mind. But it was turned down too badly, we do.

Crew is a popular sport at the University. It is even growing in prestige. Is that any reason why a suggestion which might help it further to live or help it in some of its problems should be wholly disregarded? Why would it be so unreasonable to suggest the omission of the candidate those who are not rowing in intercollegiate competition, even for the purpose of intercollegiate competition? Upon scanning our correspondent's reply we find no reason.

It seems to us, unknown as we appear to be, that any obvious suggestion which might help our business, as our business is becoming known, should be welcomed by the management of that sport. We understand that some for our readers have an interest in the number of the million, or the success of something. While it has been absolutely impossible for the crew situation, it should be successful. Why then, the unexpected idea of a harmless suggestion dropped on which conditions might improve?

If the largest number of coaches makes it impossible that not more than 800 not turn out for crew, we seldom do any better than suggest that things might be.

The Penman's opinion is relatively marked in the matter of equipment and opposition in sports and if the demand were present it is our opinion that the men of satisfying it would not be far behind.

When looking over the whole situation from a broad rear- view, the hope of our suggestion does not seem to lie in, or is the sweeping criticism which indeed. In fact, the criticism which has been hurled upon our poor little suggestion seems to have been based on a great extent on sentiment and motion rather than reason and plain facts.

When we present ideas we are not particularly unhappy when they are neglected or passed over after proper consideration by the proper authorities with full consideration of the fact that we are not a part of the committee in what we say. We do believe that our case was based on any of the above. It appears to us to have been an utter contradiction in which the whole point was missed.

The know has happened for a long time, but we do not believe that any of the success may be attributed to wisdom or judgment. If anything, we have been asked to be more patient. We may say that this is a hard place, and this is what we may do believe that our case was based on any of the above.

A PROTEST FROM YOUR OWN

That Pennsylvania has no monopoly on the problem of making its sports is evidenced by the following editorial clipped from one of our exchanges, entitled "The Mystic Penman".

"During the past two years the number of pits and wagers upon which the athletic organizations have been very startling. Since organizations, which have been handled only recently, have suddenly sprung forth with a surprising array of names. While these names are highly spiced by their owners, and although some importance may be attached to them, their great abstruseness seems to dwarf the significance of the problem.

FENCING FOR WOMEN GAINS POPULARITY

Fencing, the most recent addition to the sports roster of the women students of the University, is seriously threatening the popularity of the other sports in which the female students participate. At present it is a minor sport, but its devotees hope that it will soon be put on a par with swimming, basketball and hockey.

Miss Jean Marshfield, chairman of the group is largely in favor of the sport. She said, "It teaches the body to act in unison with the mind. It isn't nearly so dangerous as it might appear, for we are well protected. That is there has not been a single injury." Leonard Terman, coach of the men's team, is the instructor. Under his direction the girls have met fencers from Bryn Mawr College and several physical training schools in the city. Recent time next month a return match will be held with Bryn Mawr.
