by giving everything he had to the

In the 10-lb. division, the Sophomores' heavy Mills, defeated Mirror by 351: to 202. After two rounds the only match was a close one going to a split decision, but in the third round Bridges landed a body blow on the Freshman that put him down during the remainder of the bout. The Judges were unanimous in their decision in giving the bout to the Freshman in the second round.

More action was displayed in the lighter 220-lb. class. Here, the Freshmen and Sophomores were tied 18 to 18, with the meet ending in an overtime. Both battles were determined to win by the judges, who gave the win to the Freshman. There was no other chance for a second round during the entire competition. Bridges was not as expressive as the second-year man.
Hopkins, however, was guarding closely and making his points count. He landed many blows to the club, and had Hopkins practically all of the last round. Bridges was the first to win for the Freshmen.

The first round between the heavyweights was a true show for Josephson, for the Freshman gave, nice effort to reach Kinock. Kinock would hit "Gip" and then release the grip. A lot of cold for the big boxer outweighed him, but Kinock was the victor of the first few rounds. In the second round, Josephson began to hit him with falling blows; however, he saved the Sophomore from further punishment. With the opening of the last round and the crowd pushing for the "kill," "Gip" sought Kinock on the nose forcing him for a count of eight. Rudolph, however, defeated the second year, hit him up and was nearing the end of the road.

Clouds of Fish Also Revealed

Dr. Malcolm E. Temple, director of the Peabody Museum at Yale, has recently discovered the tracks of a large prehistoric fish imprinted in a bed of sandstone and shale in the Connecticut Valley. Besides these footprints, traces of a large number of fresh-water fish were found by Professor Charles E. Longwell of Yale.

In speaking of the discovery, Dr. Longwell says that the prehistoric monster is quite-frequently traced in the valley of the Connecticut River but never before have any evidences of it been found as far south as New London, where the new prints were revealed. Geologists will refer to this section of the country as the Connecticut Valley, although the present location of the river is more to the east.

According to Dr. Longwell, the river originally flowed directly south to beyond New Haven until the advent of the glacial period, when its course was diverted to the east.

The Connecticut dinosaur was evidently not appsontic reptile, as he presumed on his kind legs and scoured with its contemporaries of species of plants and other herbs. Its tracks were approximately six inches long and were divided into three divisions closely resembling the mark of a large foot. These tracks prove clearly the condition of the ground over which the animal roamed in the far distant ages. The old stumps and stumps are now hardened into rock which has kept the imprints in a fine state of preservation.

In speaking about the traces of fish that were found, Professor Longwell told how its impressions were, on the average, about four inches in length, and were completely outlined in the rock. They were discovered below the dinosaur tracks and in dark, rather than red, materials. All of the prints were those of fresh-water fish and had without doubt inhabited the shallow waters in the section.

The Love Story of a Modern Girl

by H. L. Gates—author of "Joanna"

WHAT KIND OF A WIFE WILL THE MODERN GIRL MAKE?

At the world premiere of "The Great Gatsby," Mr. and Mrs. Foster were seated in the front row of the orchestra. It was a gala affair, and the atmosphere was electric. The guests were dressed in their finest, and the music充满了 the air. The couple was Enid, the striking feature of the evening. She was wearing a black evening gown, and her hair was piled high in an elaborate style. Her eyes were blue, and she looked absolutely captivating.

Mr. Foster was a businessman, and he was known for his good taste. His wife was a socialite, and she was always surrounded by a crowd of admirers. The two of them were a perfect match, and they seemed to be deeply in love.

Vivian, the younger sister of the couple, was a newcomer to the world of high society. She was a fresh marvel to be a soft, alluring bundle of silk and color that she possessed. Vivian was a modern girl, and she was known for her boldness and her independence.

The difference between an old and a new woman is the manner in which she is received by the world. An old woman is received with respect, and she is treated as an equal. A new woman is treated as a commodity, and she is expected to perform certain duties.

"Vivian says:
"Better be sure people don't take you at your face value. A lipstick and a jar of rouge are cheap, you know."

"Dressed for her evening with Norman Foster, Vivian had a strange expression on her face. She was wearing a black evening gown, and her hair was piled high in an elaborate style. Her eyes were blue, and she looked absolutely captivating."
