Mounted in his office in Washington, D.C., the senator was preparing to speak on Power and the Constitution. He had been invited to address the American Bar Association on the subject of judicial independence. His speech was scheduled to begin at 3 p.m., and he was already seated behind his desk, reviewing the notes he had prepared.

The senator's assistant entered the office, carrying a stack of papers. "Senator, your speech is ready," he said, handing over the documents.

"Thank you, John. I'll review these notes quickly, then we can begin," the senator replied, flipping through the pages.

He stood up from his chair, walking over to the podium where a microphone was waiting for him. His speech, titled "Judicial Independence and the Constitution," would focus on the importance of an independent judiciary and the role it played in upholding the rule of law.

As he stepped up to the microphone, the senator took a deep breath. His voice rang clear and strong, filling the room with the gravitas of his message.

"Ladies and gentlemen, today I stand before you to discuss the vital issue of judicial independence. Our courts are the foundation upon which our democracy rests. It is crucial that they remain free from political influence and external pressures."

The audience listened intently, their attention riveted to the senator. He continued, "A strong and independent judiciary is necessary to protect the rights of all citizens, to ensure that the law is applied evenly, and to maintain the integrity of the judicial system."

The senator paused for a moment, allowing the audience to digest his words. Then, he pressed on, "We must ensure that judges are appointed based on merit, not political affiliation. Only then can we maintain the trust of the public in our courts."

As he concluded his speech, he saw the smiles of approval from the audience. They had been moved by his words, and they praised him for his commitment to the principles of judicial independence.

"Thank you," the senator said, bowing his head slightly in gratitude. "I hope that my words today encourage all of you to support the causes of justice and the rule of law."

All We Could Ask

Now that things have settled down, and we have wiped the dust of Franklin Field from our eyes, it is time for us to tell the football team how proud we have been of them during the past weeks.

Victims of circumstances over which they have no control, and restricted by rules not observed by their opponents, the players nevertheless gave a good account of themselves, and we believe that all credit is due to themselves and to the University as well.

The purpose of playing a game, contrary to the opinions of some, is not to win but to show what one is made of. We do not mean to minimize the efforts of the players, though, for they are more than enough said.

Capp is a busy man. He arrives at a quick smile and an apparent unshakeable sense of humor that remains constant under the most hectic circumstances.

Mr. Capp, I beg, "I know that you have two daughters of college age. You must run into a few young people. What do you think of them?"

He grinned engagingly. "I'm very fond of them. They are much surer and far better mannered than when I was a kid. I don't like them, I like them greatly and greatly I like them."

"It is quite a change for the better," the young reporter answered, "I have had my doubts about the future, the course of the curfew and the admiring surrounting us. We were now a reader from The Evening Mail,cutting through the frivolities taking pictures of everythig in sight, and a flood of marline and words being gosses." The futility of attempting to follow a clear line of questioning was obvious. Most of the questions I had intended to ask about guns were tossed aside from all sides.

"I'm not the only one who's feeling inept," he replied. "Angrily, he defied them and the jibbering in the rooms was resoured. A simple, natural, and a very curious qualt of facts and figures of this kind of humor."
