Dean Says Utah's "Bountiful" program will encourage parents to send their sons to college.

The percentage of college-age men and women who are available for college in the Utah program is "a significant one," Dr. John P. Bennett, head of the division of educational affairs, said today.

"If a high percentage of college-age men and women should find that their opportunities for higher education are limited, there will be reason for alarm," he said.

Dean Peters, in explaining the third coffee hour tomorrow, said that it will encourage parents to send their sons to college.

Taking the Roll

Compulsory Attendance Policy Lacks Insight: Supposed Benefits of System Are Negligible

by Arthur Rosenstein

At Pennsylvania, as was said above, the attendance policy, in the form of a roll, is taken by each instructor at the beginning of every class of a semester. In the past, the system was applied to a number of courses, but this year the department of mathematics is the only one that requires it. The policy is designed to prevent students from being inattentive in class and to encourage them to attend regularly.

The system is based on the theory that attendance is a measure of the student's commitment to learning. By requiring attendance, the system aims to ensure that students are present for the instruction and that they are prepared for the material covered in class.

However, the system has been criticized for its lack of insight into the benefits of regular attendance. The assumption that attending class is a measure of the student's commitment to learning has been questioned. Some argue that attending class may not necessarily mean that the student is engaged or attentive, and that other factors such as motivation and interest play a significant role.

Moreover, the system has been criticized for its negative impact on students. The system may create a sense of pressure and anxiety among students, leading to increased stress and mental health issues.

The system has also been criticized for being overly rigid and inflexible. It fails to take into account the various reasons why students may miss class, such as illness, family emergencies, and other unforeseen circumstances.

In conclusion, while the attendance policy may serve some purposes, it is not a perfect solution to the problem of student attendance. It is important to consider the potential drawbacks and limitations of the system, and to seek alternative approaches that are more effective and equitable.

Ford Foundation Gives $50 Million For Faculty Salaries

In the country there are approximately 70,000 faculty members of private institutions of higher learning, of whom 100,000 are full time. Salaries range from $5,000 to $15,000 annually, with the figures for full professors ranging from $8,000 to $10,000.

Mr. Pemberton, financial vice-president of the University, stated that "the whole thing is present in very, very small amount, and there is little and small information. "The general idea is wonderful if we are to be included in the group. Until the Ford Foundation crystallizes as it is it will be difficult to tell how much it will help the University of Pennsylvania. I am waiting for the advisory group for more information."
