Well, John, it’s hard to define the difference in a way that will satisfy everybody, because one always finds a lot of overlapping between research and development work. But most people agree that there are differences, especially in time sequence. Research work comes first, because one of its main objectives is to establish or discover new scientific facts that will supply the foundation for new industrial developments. In other words, research men seek new knowledge about matter—generally working with small quantities of it.

Development work comes later, and Du Pont has two main types. First, there is new process development. Here scientists and engineers modify, streamline, and augment the findings of research so that these chemical products can be profitably made on a large scale—or existing products can be made by new and more efficient methods. Pilot-plant operations are usually included under this heading.

Second, an important kind of development work is directed toward improvement of existing processes and products. Here the men study how to obtain yield increases, utilize by-products, increase outputs, and solve sales service problems as they arise. This may require considerable research, and that belongs back to the overlapping I previously mentioned.

There are genuine differences, John, but a good deal of similarity, too—especially in the constant need for imagination and creative effort. I think you’ll find that research and development work are equally challenging and rewarding at Du Pont.
