Editorial

* Well Done

It is not too often that a speaker gains the rapt attention of an audience to his words, for this usually requires endurance of thought, presentation and presentation. We do not know to what extent Dr. William Hardman prepared for his Hey Day address last Friday. What does matter is that the final product which he left with the audience in Tyndall Auditorium commands respect and deserves to be re-memorized by all of us.

To reiterate or paraphrase what this fine old gentleman of Pennsylvania said in his address would be of little value to any of us. His views on the world situation, American society, and the college student of today, were combined into an effective evaluation of everything which we, as students, should strive to attain. Nothing much more can be said about the 1958 Hey Day address, and the man responsible for it. To hear Dr. Hardman was prerequisite for an understanding of many things which concern us as citizens and students.

His thoughts were crystal clear, and we were fortunate to have heard them.
