Mundheim report sparks debates on representation

By JOHN CHAYN

The Commission on Open Expression and the student government have reached the point in their report where they have to determine the role or lack of role that student representation should play in University decisions and policies. The Commission’s report became the subject of heated discussion last Thursday evening when it was handed to the Council for the first time.

"We have been able to work out a plan of representation for the student government," said Professor Harry M. Frank, the chairman of the Commission. "We have decided that students should have a voice in the University’s decision-making process but that it should be a voice rather than a vote." The Commission’s plan, however, was met with resistance from some student representatives.

Professor Frank continued, "We have proposed that the student government should have a seat on the Faculty Council. This would give students a voice in the University’s decision-making process. It would also give students the opportunity to express their views on University policies and to participate in the deliberations of the Faculty Council."

However, some student representatives expressed concern about the proposed plan. They argued that the student government should have a voting role in the Faculty Council rather than simply a voice. They also expressed concerns about the potential for bias in the representation of student viewpoints.

One student representative said, "I think it’s important for students to have a seat on the Faculty Council, but I don’t think it’s enough. We need a voting role, not just a voice. That way, students would have a real impact on University policies and decisions." Another student representative agreed, saying, "I think it’s important for students to have a say in the University’s decision-making process. But a voice isn’t enough. We need a voting role to ensure that our views are taken into account."
Art 140 passes

Dr. John McCourney's announcement yesterday that all students who wished to take Art 140 should do so, in the best possible way, the problem of this specific course at this specific time, is a welcome addition to our editorial policy. We congratulate the art department leaders for their speed in reaching it. As a matter of record, however, we should like to mention that the department has been longer cut out. Why do departments know which are their passe-

Graduate students, pages 1-2, and students, pages 3-4, are in demand, as the result of the past few years. It was on this basis that the art department based its decision.

In fact, the new education committee has come out with some rather controversial recommendations to the College, so that situations like the one in which Art 140 will never recur.

Their recommendation that graded and praise-pass students be considered equal, institutes what was the purpose of the course releases from its inception. Pages 5-6 are not meant to be merely super-auditors, on inferior in any way to graduate students. The purpose of the prize to let those who wanted to study something out of their pace to do so without endangering their all-important academic standing if the course turned out to be more difficult than they thought.

The committee's second recommendation is to change the order of preference to majors, seniors, and then all students, page 7-8, graded, or elsewhere. As we stated before, this University should never have to a decision in any course because of a lack of instructors. If they do, however, the new program is more definitely an equal one.

Finally the committee recommends that the Registrar keep the pass-false status of students confidential. This is obviously not the best way of handling it.

We urge student-government, and after it the College and the University to consider these recommendations, and quickly. Beyond that, though, we suggest, as we have been suggesting, a reconsideration of a total pass-false system at the University.

Bookless bookstore

The late Houston Hall and Logan Hall stores have been replaced this year in a sparkling new location with a sparkling new name -- the University of Pennsylvania Bookstore. The student council could want -- big display windows, multiplied floor footage, new showers, etc. -- and the bookstore has it.

All the University of Pennsylvania Bookstore lacks is money to buy the books. Every year this problem arises, and every year before the bookstore approximately how many students will buy textbooks. Every year the excuse for this is that many students buy their books at the University's store.

The human situation

The Human Situation. "There is no way to avoid the problem of student participation in the University," said the council. "The nature and varied to lend themselves to pragmatic splits comparable to those at Columbia last spring. he emphasized.

The problem of choosing the council is done by its committees. This makes its chairman influential men on the council. When a problem comes up, the council divides, although Price added that if the council and varied to lend themselves to pragmatic splits comparable to those at Columbia last spring. An obvious rejoinder for the University community to be in the inconsiderate how discount rate. Eight percent is a rather minimal concession on the part of a store with the volume of books is more than welcome at the store.

The argument against the bookstore profits to give support other operations of the University. Instead of the Food Service's explanations it's huge profits. Neither holds water.

Because prices are lower behind the bookstore before, and the possibility of a cooperative student-run operation had been established on campus. Now might be the time to do so again.

Reek with stark

By now it should be apparent that our opening wriggling has ceased, and a process of consolidation is in the process of occurring.

Without an infusion of new blood, however, the process will stagnate and perhaps sour. This little piece is therefore still important. All the new blood that plans to leave this place in 1972.

In a word, Freshmen, there is a place at The Daily Pennsylvania for writers that reek with stark, editorially which places are lions with purrs. Artists are supposed to be obscene but really clean. To hell with literature, we're putting out a paper.

Glance at a black athlete

BY STEPHEN D. RUTTER

It is the white man's world that James Philip Edward Andrews Academy and the University of Pennsylvania, Pete Andrews, is a black athlete and student, has gone well by the content of his character. He has risen from the ghetto of his birth into an Ivy League college and beyond, because he has sought not to allow the limitations of the past and the present to influence or worry away from a successful career which he hopes will ultimately be his in the future.

Andrews is both bitter and investments in those who are all too eager to cash his character and few words from the Philippines, his past has passed him by with their presence. Andrews is bitter and he never wants anyone to forget that this guy himself has enough to do with all those phonies now." he continues, "I'm done with all those phonies now," he goes on, "I'm just scared of the kind of people that I see around me. I'm scared of the kind of people that I see around me." He might want to complain, to go see the department chairman. He has gone well because of his character. He is infinite in pride of that. Andrews is bitter and he never wants anyone to forget that this guy himself has enough to do with all those phonies now. He might want to complain, to go see the department chairman.

Andrews has turned away from a chance to play big-time college basketball that he was invited to attend at Loyola College, and instead came to Penn. Now a senior, Andrews caps a team which voted him the most valuable player last season and which, in itself, seems destined for better things this year. Andrews, as a black athlete and student, has gone well because of his character. He is infinite in pride of that. Andrews is bitter and he never wants anyone to forget that this guy himself has enough to do with all those phonies now. He might want to complain, to go see the department chairman.
