Richard M. Nixon and Vice President Humphreynin the race for the presidency. The final results will not be known until the early hours of today, but it was already clear that three important factors had influenced the outcome of the election.

- The youth vote: Humphrey, with his appeal to younger voters, won a decisive majority in the swing states and among urban residents. This was a significant shift from past elections, where older voters had traditionally held more sway.

- The war issue: The question of the Vietnam War was a major factor in the campaign, with Humphrey criticizing Nixon's foreign policy and Nixon accusing Humphrey of being soft onCommunist China. Humphrey's position on the war helped him in the swing states, where many voters were concerned about the impacts of the war.

- The ticket: The Nixon/Humphrey ticket was more cohesive than the previous one, with a strong showing from both Democratic and Republican voters.

The outcome of the national polls gave both parties the necessary margin to win the election. The final results confirmed that Humphrey had won the presidency with a slim margin, but the implications of this victory were significant for the future of American politics.
