Soc. Requirements Changed; Courses Re-opened for Majors

By JONATHAN B. SALSAMOE

The sociology department, threatened by a faculty shortage for the academic year 1971-72, announced late last week a "temporary" elimination of one of the department's major requirements."

In a statement issued last Friday, Dr. Edward Friedman, acting under chairman, stated that senior sociology majors will not be required to take two advanced sociology courses before the level of sociology 12. Friedman noted that the requirement—deregistered at the beginning of last fall—would not rule on the allocation of fees. He also stated that the University had filed by deducting 12 from the $50 matriculation fee of all interested students was legal, but that the $50 matriculation fee was a bail fund for "the violence of police repression and action with Activity Council funds was illegal."

Tenure

The possibility of reimbursing students in the area of tenure decisions "was brought up at the meeting," Rosenberg remarked, "but I don't think the students thought it was very important." Rosenberg went on to say that there must remain something of the physical presence of students at meetings of the junior faculty would constitute adequate student representation.

Read said he felt the students were merely "willing to settle" for representation in the tenure committee without voting privileges, but he found them "very happy with what happened." The meeting was much more "productive" than he had expected. "The degree of representation granted to students, he continued, "was as much as I had hoped for."

Richard Beeman, assistant professor of history, predicted that his proposal for a student faculty committee in the history department, saying "I don't anticipate much trouble in getting this thing through. We never really vote on anything in the history department anyway," he added. "We just all agreed until we've talked things out."

The department's chairman, Baker, said there is a "very good chance" that the proposal will be approved. However, he expressed "very serious concern" that the atmosphere of pressure being brought to bear on history department members to vote against the proposal, commenting that many members of other departments would not be so happy to see such a procedure established.

Read said a meeting of all history majors will be held Wednesday to express any ideas the representatives to the tenured faculty meetings can have.

Sociology

"As a view of the shortage of courses to fulfill this requirement," the statement continued, "I find that it is absolutely necessary that we relax the requirement that two of four courses be of sociology. This would: (a) allow us to handle the faculty vacuum created by the resignation of Tiberius' tenure candidates. (b) make possible the presence of students in all sociology courses, and (c) allow the department to expand the "anti-establishment" and "anti-settlement.""

Although Friedman said that this change only directly affects seniors in the department. He added that the requirement might eventually be completely abolished. "By this time next year," Friedman noted, "they'll probably have had enough of all these courses...the increases will start to chase the clientele of these courses...the requirement is going to become obsolete." The second proposal, aiming to reduce the clientele of these courses, was not on the ballot.

The proposal, termed illegal by Ballad, was offered by Mr. Russell and Stel Menden, a junior in the College. The second proposal was described as a replacing of Wiedemer's plan.

Wiedemer's plan was passed by a referendum held April 19 and is by a 777 to 448 vote. The second proposal was set on the ballot.

Black March

Black students at Pennsylvania live, partly through their own initiatives and partly through the forces of history, in a world in which it is impossible to be unaware of the other. Their interaction with white students and their intra-black relations are two major tasks of building black awareness within the private confines of the black social center. Only rarely do they encounter the outside world, although they are convinced that this administration has betrayed its confines of the black social center. Only when they demonstrate once again how vast are the growing up at Pennsylvania.

Pink dog to the floor at the time I remember pouting and hurling my pudgy little man in red who distributed goodies with happy idealism. With such good intentions and the Steering Committee seemed how can one be angry with either? Since it is obvious that every student has a warped idealism. The support can be understood on those grounds, but hardly on the present system would only be preordained rules. The proposal for representative government, the steering committee's refusal at its inception to the renewal of the administration's support for programs the black committees consider are their objectives.

Yesterday's two hour march through and around campus is a reaction to an occasion, as the black students charged that an alleged lack of support in several of the groups was a "initiated to eliminate everything that is necessary for the growth of black people. But more than anything else it served to demonstrate again how much there are the differences between the two worlds which are growing up at Pennsylvania.

While sympathizing with the goals expressed in the black students' demands for the intensive replacement of black students, the establishment of a meaningful program of black studies, the appointment of a high level administration to deal primarily with black students, and the creation of a black advising center, it cannot be certain that the administration is as charged.

It certainly which we find in mostly due to an unwillingness on the part of blacks to fully explain their anger. A two page press release is hardly sufficient to explain all facets of the complicated problems that the blacks were moved to march about.

The proposal for no government makes provision for ultimate student power with crisis plena and demise and sadder still on its successor. Santa Claus and UPCos

I suppose I was about six years old when I discovered there was no Santa Claus. It was a cold, windy December morning and I was in the solarium getting ready for breakfast. I was wide awake and there was no smell of Christmas but like the north wind, a spirit of happiness did appear and even the cat was happy and danced around as if things would be okay.

It sounds like a fairy tale, but that's exactly what Vic Catalano has become since he enrolled at Penn. He has put together a 1.80 earned run average, allowed fewer hits per game pitched as a sophomore, and earned two varsity letters. Not that he hasn't earned the right to be talked about, but the lightning-fast left-hander has consistently captured the attention of his teammates for one reason: he's not only a very good pitcher, but a great pitcher for the Quakers. Coach Murray has noticed a few other things about Catalano. "He's a very determined person," he said. "Whatever he does, he always gets it done."

The Childs Cup race will be the first time that the Quakers will get a chance to see how good they really are. The Quakers have won 32 cups since the inception of the race, and have won the cup almost every year since it was first established in 1879. The cup was originally for racing among the four-oared Penn boats, and was presented in 1879 by George W. Childs, the founder of the Childs Cup. Since 1907, the contest has been between the Quakers and the Tigers. The cup is certainly a symbol of the rivalry between the two schools, and the contest has been a source of pride for both teams. A crowd of over 100 ex-basketball players and coaches attended a reunion dinner last night at the Academy Club. The event, which was held to commemorate the 15th anniversary of the Academy's first basketball team, was a resounding success. The guests included a number of former players, coaches, and friends, and the evening was filled with reminiscences and good fellowship. Among the highlights of the evening were the speeches given by former players and coaches, who shared their memories of the Academy's early days. The event was a great success, and the Academy looks forward to hosting similar reunions in the future.
