The Daily Pennsylvanian
Admissions: Meyerson, Faculty Senate At Odds?

Three years ago, William Owen was removed from his post as dean of admissions at the University of Pennsylvania. "I was one of the first people to resign under pressure," he said,

WILLIAM OWEN

With a shake of his head, Owen said, "I have a feeling that we have become an administration that is not interested in the welfare of students."

The controversy that has swirled around the admissions office at the University of Pennsylvania is not just about the decisions made by the admissions committee, but also about the way in which those decisions are made. The University, like many others, has been under pressure to increase the number of minority students on campus, but the methods used to achieve this goal have been controversial.

Last Monday, the steering Committee of the University of Pennsylvania's College of Arts and Sciences approved a proposal to increase the number of minority students in the College. The proposal, which was introduced by the College's Faculty Senate, calls for the appointment of a committee to study the issue and make recommendations to the administration.

The proposal is designed to address the concerns of minority students, who have complained that the University's admissions policies are unfair. The proposal also addresses the concerns of faculty members, who have complained that the University's admissions policies are too lenient.

The proposal, which was approved by a vote of 8 to 2, calls for the appointment of a committee to study the issue and make recommendations to the administration. The committee will be chaired by the dean of the College of Arts and Sciences.

"We have had a very difficult year," said the dean of the College of Arts and Sciences. "We have had to make some tough decisions, and we have had to deal with a lot of criticism."

"But we have also had some successes," he added. "We have increased the number of minority students on campus, and we have made some improvements in the way we handle admissions."
