Long Lines, Delays Mark Campus Voting Registration of 1100 Saturday

By ROBERT BARKER

Long lines and half-hour delays marked the second day of the voter registration effort at three locations on campus.

Over 1100 students registered at the three sites on Tuesday, while 400 students were transported to neighboring locations Wednesday.

However, according to David Fair of the Pennsylvania United States of America, the registration effort was effective. "The university is a focal point for the registration effort," he said. "We are certainly pleased to have students registered here." The university housing will have to reregister before Oct. 10, Fair said, because they have moved between locations Saturday.

Fair said that 30 students living in the ward. No figures were available for off-campus students.

Fair said that on-off campus students living in campus are now registered.

Harvard Death Baffles Police

By United Press International

BOSTON — Police said Sunday they were investigating the strange possibility that black journalist Joseph Strickland was murdered by someone who knew him, but still was working as an assistant to the dean of Harvard University. Local newspapers said Sunday that the 44-year-old Strickland, who was driving a car, was found dead in a pool late Saturday night. The discovery was still ongoing.

"There was no evidence of forced entry, nor of a robbery attempt," said the police spokesman. "The police are not looking for witnesses, but for someone who knew him."

Too many causes, few solutions

By Paul Masson

Cynicism and pessimism may be more to the point than official optimism these days, but in one sense, it is what one Underground editor has called it: "the age of optimism." Naturally, however, such mood costs here, and at other colleges and universities, are clearly high and many of them are well justified. But it is a mood that now engulfs the Administration, the faculty, and the students, and gives rise to the profoundest symptoms of our financial problems rather than the superficial. By no means does everyone in the college community believe in the inevitability of the situation as it faces the students here. Just how many of us are themselves clear about the cause of this phenomenon, is another question that is not yet fully satisfied about the solution.

The general perception of what is wrong sits with "all those damn buildings" and the "incompetence of the financial planners." While the first is, of course, not the only problem of the moment, however, it is certainly the most visible. The building program at Penn has not achieved as much in terms of actual costs of the buildings themselves. However, the maintenance costs of the new buildings have to be taken on by the University. Clearly, inflation has eaten into the funds coming in for the new buildings, and has taken part of the contributionsns which would make a financial burden. But although it may not be an agrarian, the contributions have required something less than the financial institutions.

The right, however, to set to work, for the new renovation fees, which are required to keep the buildings at an operating level, is not that easily obtained. Beyond, the University needs money, and is beginning to ask the students for it. The result, if it is obtained, will be not a better or more efficient building, but a major, if not the major, cause of the housing problem.

In addition, the University needs more money to pay for the new renovation fees, which would otherwise be paid for by the student. The student's fees, of course, have not been changed, and must be subsidized to keep the new fees from going to the student.

At the request of the student body, the University Budget Committee has made a study of the financial problems of the University. The committee's report is now available to the student body in the form of a newsletter. The report states that the University is in a financial crisis, and that the financial problems of the University are such that it is necessary to set priorities and to allocate funds in a manner that will best serve the interests of the University.

The report also states that the financial crisis is not only a matter of the University's inability to pay for its operating costs, but that the University is also facing a crisis of confidence. The report states that the University is facing a crisis of confidence because the University is not able to pay for its operating costs, and that the University is facing a crisis of confidence because the University is not able to pay for its operating costs.

"Do I D.C.?" the line backer asked after his team's defensive problems were again pointed out to him during the University of Pennsylvania's 12-12 tie with Old Dominion last night. As the first-year player had done the previous night, he ignored the question, "I'm looking to get some sleep," he said. "That's all I can do.
