Specter to Face Fitzpatrick in November District Attorney Battle

By JOHN DANIELS

Two University Law School graduates, Republican Arlen Specter and Democrat Fred Fitzpatrick, will vie for the Philadelphia district attorney's office in the Nov. 7 election.

The two candidates will be vying for the seat vacated by longtime incumbent, Democrat Henry J. Weissman, who retired last year.

Specter has become a familiar public figure for his attacks on alleged corruption in city government and as a frequent critic of Senator Joseph Biden, who is seeking re-election.

The University council has been working to address the issue of underage drinking on campus, and both candidates have expressed their support for the effort.

United States Sailors Ravage Scottish Town

DENMARK, SCOTLAND (UPI) - A rash of sailors from the U.S. battleship horne at Holy Loch ran through the Firth of Clyde resort town last night, smashing shop windows and beating up some folks. Police and bystanders.

Four of the estimated 10 rioters were arrested and will appear in court Monday, a police spokesman said.

The others fled back to their ship, he said.

About 30 Danish residents received hospital treatment after the riot but only two--including a police officer--were held overnight, the spokesman said.

Residents said the riot erupted without warning when the sailors from the U.S. battleship horne smashed the windows of a post and began throwing pots and pans with whiskey bottles.

Retroactive and Regressive

In a more shockingly reminiscent of their aborted attempts to change the undergraduate curriculum, the Wharton faculty is considering the abandonment of the present grade point system, as well as any credit grading system and implementation of a five-tier grading system.

The retrogressive proposal to establish a distinguished pass, pass, pass, pass, fail, no credit grading system is nothing more than a thinly-disguised B/C/D/F system.

Furthermore, the imposition of the five-tier system by the faculty would be in obvious contradiction to the wishes of the Wharton Graduate students. A poll by the Wharton Graduate Association (WGA) showed that 85% of the student body believes the five-tier grading system should be continued. A mere 4% favored the five-tier system proposed by faculty members.

We firmly believe that, in the light of such statistics, the five-tier system would have a negative effect on the education of Wharton graduate students and that the proposed five-tier system is "pejorative" from a potential student's point of view.

I am publicly offering to purchase any credit category, including the "C" grade, at a profit of 50 cents on the dollar. Outside of this, I am willing to purchase any credit category at a profit of 25 cents on the dollar.

Concerning the economy, I heartily agree with Mr. Marshall's comment, "encouraging the development of safe and efficient public transportation."

But how long will that last? We have been over 50 years overdue on public transportation. Meanwhile, the yellow cabs are still in business.

Moreover, no one doubts that this is the end of May, 1974, there will be a more critical need for public transportation in Philadelphia.

Looking at the crazy lineup along the streets and highways, how many passengers are in tune with these Backs and LTD's? Nearly 100 per cent of all automobiles, for example, drive alone to work. In contrast to the fact that 20% of the public are in cars, 20% are in buses, 20% in taxis, and 20% in walk, we have a transportation system that is designed to encourage hitchhiking (and in case you are interested, even with support it is given to the cooperating driver).

On the contrary, opening up any sort of credit grading system is not going to put an end to the exploitive policies of our society, but rather it will allow anybody any way out of the problem.

Furthermore, allowing hitchhiking is not going to stop either pollution or spread of subject of violence or a spread of subject of subject of violence or a spread of subject of violence or a spread of Tuition Hikes and the Middle-Income Student

The survey, entitled "The Future of Higher Education," was undertaken by Princeton assistant professor John Martin, the director of the study who warned that "the middle-income student is the most sensitive to changes in college tuition costs." Martin's team of researchers interviewed 1400 high school seniors and their families in order to determine how changes in college costs affect this group.

The survey found that a significant number of middle-income families are being forced to reduce their contributions to college costs by relying on student loans. While many middle-income students are able to obtain some financial aid, the survey found that the amount of aid available is often not sufficient to cover the full cost of tuition.

The study also found that middle-income students are more likely to work part-time jobs to pay for college expenses, and that these jobs are often connected to the need to work in order to achieve quality education.

The survey results indicate that the situation for middle-income students is not improving. While some families are able to secure loans, others are forced to reduce their funding contributions or increase their reliance on student loans. The results suggest that a new trend toward quality education and a broader demand for prestige institutions may be increasing the financial burden on middle-income families.

In conclusion, the survey highlights the challenges faced by middle-income students and their families in accessing quality education. The results suggest the need for increased financial support and policy interventions to address the growing financial burden on this group.
