Congress Rejects Bill For Tax-Free Loans

By STEPH ROSEN

A U.S. House Committee rejected an amendment to a Senate tax bill Friday, which would have made tax-free certain types of student loans now considered taxable by the Internal Revenue Service.

The amendment, sponsored by Sen. Phillip Chmey (D-Md.), was offered during debate on a bill that would extend the 1073 IKS decision to the entire tax code. The legislation, which was passed unanimously, awaits action by the House Finance Committee.

Franklin, who is currently responsible for the administration and staffing, said the committee will continue to study the possibility of overhauling and reorganizing the administration and staffing of the University.

The committee is considering several options for the administration and staffing, including the possibility of creating a new position for the chief administrative officer.

A spokesperson for Congresswoman Roosevelt's office said Friday that the amendment was not tied to a particular policy issue.

The amendment was introduced by Congressman Roosevelt to address a concern expressed by some members of Congress.

The amendment was passed by a vote of 23 to 0, with two abstentions.

The amendment would have allowed for the tax-free treatment of certain types of student loans, including loans for medical students, loans for graduate students, and loans for undergraduate students.

The amendment was not expected to pass in the Senate, where it was expected to face opposition from Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.).

The amendment was not expected to pass in the House, where it was expected to face opposition from Speaker Paul Ryan (R-Wis.).

The amendment was not expected to pass in the White House, where it was expected to face opposition from President Donald Trump.
Radicalism On Campus

By Gary A. Dymski

It seems a century ago that College Hall used to be occupied by anti-war protesters, although only three years have passed since then, and even dormitory in the manner are the firewalls that In Penn in the late cities in the form of widespread student radicalism.

The issues turned around the campus now provide identical, recurrent, but not quite resonant, lenses. These local controversies are handed along in an unspectacular, imprecise, bureaucratic procedure. The WPLS, the local University police. The anonymous reverberating cases have sparked the spirit of campus. They are part of a department of University activities. But there are qualitative differences between these issues and the manner of their handling. The number of student participants in the debates that have appeared and disappeared is infinitesimal in comparison with the extent of the University is no longer a notion of a university campus.

The general cry goes from campus to campus, notably the outburst of activity on the part of the Panthers on the University of Pennsylvania and the black dress issue of three years ago. Primarily, it is the right of socalled self-expression. For the University, students, it is basic. The right to sit, to stand, to write, to act, to intervene in the world, to think, and to trust with authority of others is not exist.

In the thick of the anti-war protestation, the University, as well as college all over the country, was picked out as the target because it was viewed as being an artifice of the entire struggle of control in definitions of the University, as well as the young generation.

It was a round-up of the Big Five that had college running coaches looking to the future. Only one of the Big Five teams - Villanova - had a runner finish in the top six.

In Princeton, Coach Jim Tuppeny has a team that could challenge Villanova, should provide the only real competition for the "Heps" this season. "I think our team has a chance of winning the Ivy league title," he said.

Tuppeny's team will not only be headlined by the freshman Ken Poskitt, but will also feature last year's second finisher in the Ivy league title, Bill Hartman, and junior Mike Kintisch, who will be among the top runners for the "Quakers." Both Hartman and Poskitt will be the team's number two runners.

The Princeton team is a mix of experience and youth, with the freshmen and sophomores providing the depth. The "Quakers" are expected to be strong at the 3-mile and 5-mile distances, and should be competitive at the 10,000-yard and 15,000-yard distances.
