The University Life Trustee John H. Walnut had noted that "we will negotiate with several professional theater groups for next year's scheduling." He noted that the Center for the Arts, under the direction of Managing Director Stephen Goff, has been successful in bringing in new audiences and in creating a sense of community. He added that more funds would be needed to maintain this level of success.

In the Next Hundred Years

When Will We See a Colonial Institute?

By Peter Ginsberg

As every year runs out of Washington in January, the often rhetorical question of what the nation's highest education institution should be is as fresh as the new year itself. We are currently between two crises, the first of which would have been a 70-year-old establishment's own to tackle if it still had the ability. The second is a crisis of education, not financial, but of a society which is unable to sustain its own institutions. This crisis has been marked by a growing neglect of higher education, both in the United States and internationally. The result is a decline in the quality of our educational institutions, which are becoming increasingly dependent on state and federal funding.

The first crisis, the need to support higher education, has been recognized by the international community. The United Nations has set the goal of ensuring universal access to quality education for all by 2030. However, the funding for higher education has been steadily declining, with many countries experiencing cuts in their education budgets. This is particularly true in the United States, where the number of full-time equivalent students has declined by 12% since 2000.

The second crisis, the need for innovation in higher education, is also acute. The traditional model of higher education, centered around lecture-based instruction, is increasingly out of date. Students are looking for more personalized and interactive learning experiences, and technology is allowing us to deliver these experiences in new and innovative ways. But the infrastructure of higher education is not yet ready to support this transformation.

The United States is not alone in facing these challenges. Countries around the world are grappling with similar issues, and the solutions they are finding are likely to be as varied as the countries themselves. What is clear is that higher education is facing a defining moment, and we must act now to ensure that it continues to thrive.

David Gregor, the University's director of development, has said that the University's financial situation is "very real and very immediate." The University is facing a $31 million budget shortfall for fiscal 2018, and the prospects for the future are not encouraging. The University's endowment, which is used to support scholarships and other financial aid, has declined by nearly 2% in the past year. The University is also facing a decline in enrollment, with a 4% drop in undergraduate applications in the past year.

Despite these challenges, the University's leadership is committed to finding solutions. They have announced a plan to cut costs, including a 7% tuition hike and a plan to eliminate the College of Liberal Arts. The University has also announced a plan to increase fundraising efforts, with a goal of raising $500 million over the next five years.

But the University's problems are not limited to finances. The University is also facing a number of other challenges, including a decline in academic quality, a lack of diversity, and a lack of accountability. The University's response to these challenges has been largely inadequate, and there is little reason to believe that the University will be able to turn things around on its own.

The University's problems are not unique to it, but they are a symptom of a broader crisis in higher education. The United States, and the world, is facing a crisis in higher education that requires a collective response. The University, as the nation's oldest and most prestigious institution, must take a lead in addressing these challenges.

The University must also confront the issue of race and diversity. The University's history of racial segregation and exclusion has left a legacy of inequality that continues to this day. The University must take steps to address this legacy, including by increasing its commitment to diversity and inclusion, and by working to create a more inclusive and welcoming campus for all students.

The University also faces a crisis of accountability. The University has been accused of covering up sexual assault and harassment, and of failing to provide adequate support and resources for survivors. The University must take steps to address these issues, including by providing better support and resources for survivors, and by holding those responsible accountable.

In conclusion, the University is facing a defining moment. The University must address its financial challenges, improve its academic quality, increase its commitment to diversity and inclusion, and increase its accountability. The University must also take a lead in addressing the broader crisis in higher education, and work to create a more just and equitable society for all.

Med Training Program Initiated By Hospital

By ANY SCHULTZ

Children’s Hospital has initiated a short-term residency training program aimed at improving the quality of pediatric care in the Philadelphia area.

The three-year program is being funded by a $300,000 grant from the William Penn Foundation.

The course involves a four week "mini-residency" and a hospital rotation in several critical areas. The doctors are exposed to current concepts and trends in several medical diseases, orthopedics, hematology which include oncology, infectious therapy in a particular sub-specialty, "mini-residency" and a hospital funded by a $300,000 grant from the William Penn Foundation.

Tuesday, February 10, 1976

Paid a $2000 stipend to make up the loss to their private practice incurred while attending the program. At the end of the training period, diplomas will be awarded.

Doughty said Monday the program has been met with "overwhelming enthusiasm" from the doctors who have participated thus far shown by doing as well as they did. He said he felt the object of the program was not "re-educate academically", but to "re-educate" the physicians.

Doughty said the hospital would try to keep the program going after the three year grant expires. If not further support is not acquired the course would continue without the stipend, he added.

Generally, Doughty said, the participants are "overwhelmed at the enthusiasm" from the doctors who have participated thus far. He said, "The Student Bicentennial Guide to Philadelphia" portrays nightmarish visions—hilarious, political, surrealistic. X-rated, risqué—hilarious, political, surrealistic. X-rated, risqué. It is an unusual touch for a guidebook. The first play in this series "Sweet Bird of Youth" called .. "BEAUTIFUL . . . POETIC MOVING . . . " by Clive Barnes, New York Times.

Super Bowl 10: When All Is Not Said and Done

Super Bowl X was a classic, with the Pittsburgh Steelers winning 14-7 against the Dallas Cowboys. The game was marked by a key play from Reggie Harrison of the Steelers, who blocked a punt by Mitch Hoopes. This play, along with Terry Bradshaw's stellar performance, helped the Steelers secure the championship.

The game was a defensive struggle, with both teams playing well on both sides of the ball. The Steelers' defense was led by Larry Brown, who intercepted a pass and returned it for a touchdown. The Cowboys' quarterback, Roger Staubach, threw an interception to Riddick, which helped the Steelers take control of the game. The game was also notable for the work of Franco Harris, who rushed for 101 yards and a touchdown.

The game was a testament to the skills of both teams, and it was a fitting end to a season that saw both teams play well. The Steelers' victory was a testament to their resilience and their ability to overcome obstacles. The Cowboys' loss was a blow to their hopes of getting back to the Super Bowl, but it was also a sign of their ability to bounce back and continue to compete at a high level.

The game was also notable for the performance of Terry Bradshaw, who was named the game's MVP. Bradshaw threw for 144 yards and a touchdown, and he also rushed for 26 yards and a touchdown. His performance was a key factor in the Steelers' victory, and it helped cement his status as one of the great quarterbacks in NFL history.

The game was a classic, and it will be remembered as one of the great Super Bowls of all time. It was a game of heartbreak for the Cowboys, but it was also a game of triumph for the Steelers. The game was a testament to the skills of both teams, and it was a fitting end to a season that saw both teams play well. The Steelers' victory was a testament to their resilience and their ability to overcome obstacles. The Cowboys' loss was a blow to their hopes of getting back to the Super Bowl, but it was also a sign of their ability to bounce back and continue to compete at a high level.
