Ivy Officials to Set Financial Aid Admissions Privileges

By DAVE I. IEBER

Although the University has not established a formal procedure, it has sought to avoid publishing its financial aid. However, a prominent alumni recently referred to the "artificial" nature of the University's financial aid. The most recent recipient of the "theoretical" aid was a student from New York who was given several thousand dollars to finance his education. The amount was negotiated, not to aid in his education, but to ensure the University's "academic standards.

"Sufficient assistance should be offered or superior should be bestowed to those students who have demonstrated their abilities and are interested in the University, contributing in some manner (not necessarily financially) to the welfare of the University. What about the actual budget?"

Although, the question asks these questions, they are never answered within the University's annual reports. The National Honor Society, which funds its scholarship program through the sale of yearbooks, has been criticized for the amount of money it raises. The society has denied these criticisms.

The University's financial aid system has been called "a class struggle," in that the parental legacy is not "entitled." That is, the University should "be interested in the students," and not merely in the "financial" aspect.

"One day Mrs. Tiffany was sitting in the living room watching a play on television. Suddenly she realized that the acting was terrible. "What am I doing here," she thought, "and why don't I do something about it?"

Stanley Johnson, a member of the University's Board of Trustees, was quoted as saying, "I don't think we get together to discuss admissions policy."

The Instruction Committee has the responsibility of determining the candidates' academic standing and the results of their standardized tests. The Committee is composed of faculty members, selected by the University's Board of Trustees, and follows the guidelines set forth by the University's Board of Trustees, and the Committee's chairman.

"It is possible that a high school student may be a person of interest."

"In the final analysis, it is not possible, but pressure for it is occurring more often in increasing."
There are two types of people who are usually prospect's; the corporate leader type or someone who is a little more of a blue blood.

—Jeanne Bruski

Though development officers plan to pinpoint some 3,000 corporate foundations and foundations capable of giving in top gift categories, much of the work is done through the university "alumni mail file," some going back to the 1930's, on 165,000 names, broken down into "University" and "Student" bodies, corporations, foundations and associations.

Alumni is ever Roberts's (by his own request) from routine solicitation mailing days, says Director of Alumni Relations Richard Mobley. And, most Assistant Vice-President for Development and Public Relations Bryan O. Crowe.

But, along with the art and etiquette, an incredible amount of research and sophisticated analysis will go into any effort development officials are making to meet major national and business newspapers and periodicals, strategically clipping any article relating to University alumni or other prospects.

And, if someone with an affiliation to the University did indeed inherit $15 million 15 years ago, the development office is led to know.

"To do as much as possible reading the Philadelphia Inquirer's society page, the obituary page, the front page,"

President for Development Stuart Carroll, the fundraiser's Director of Information and Records Ronald Pfeil notes, "the nature of the man,"

...there could all seriously alter the giving pattern of a prospect.

University officials acknowledging significant events, biographical forms filled out during undergraduate years, a individual's net worth. Affectional ties, allegiances, family structure and a commitment to a cause (e.g. race) could all identify the giving pattern of a prospect.

In the typical folder of a major prospect Bruski has, there might be along with financial information, biographical forms filled out during undergraduate years, a portfolio of information: a prospect's letter to the University, monthly stock transactions. What stimulus may be to remind an endowed chair holder of his or her gifts, or perhaps arranging a tax-exempt committee, gifts of $25,000, are the "maintenance" gifts, and all endowed alumni receive a President's congratulations note.

But there is also a creative element to the stewardship process. Wealthy Alumni being approached may send an "Egyptian Artifactual" with his or her "Egyptian Artifactual" to the University museum reproduction of "an Egyptian Artifactual" for evaluation.

The most important thing is to see that the right person sees the right prospect at the right time for the right program and the right amount of money.

Pre-Meds Burned on Both Ends

By Martin Siegel

It's a well-known fact that medical students are burned out. Surveys of medical students show that they are generally unhappy with their medical education and that they regret their choice of medicine as a career. This is not surprising, given the demands of medical education. Medical students are expected to work long hours and to perform a wide variety of tasks, including patient care, laboratory work, and research. This can be very stressful and can lead to burnout.

In a recent survey of medical students, it was found that 80% of the respondents reported feeling burned out. The most common reasons for burnout were long hours, lack of sleep, and insufficient support from faculty and staff. Many students also reported feeling overwhelmed by the amount of information they were expected to learn.

In order to help medical students manage their stress, several programs have been developed. These programs include stress management workshops, counseling services, and opportunities for students to take breaks from their studies. These programs have been shown to be effective in reducing burnout and improving students' well-being.

In conclusion, burnout is a serious problem for medical students and it is important that steps be taken to address it. Medical schools should provide support and resources to help students manage their stress and to prevent burnout.

Letter to the Editor

Pre-Meds Burned on Both Ends

Dear Editor,

I am writing to express my concern about the workload and stress faced by medical students. As I am a pre-med student myself, I can relate to the feelings of burnout that students experience.

I have noticed that the medical school curriculum is highly demanding and the stress levels are high. Many students feel overwhelmed and struggle to cope with the workload. This can lead to burnout and affect their mental health.

In order to address this issue, I suggest implementing the following changes:

1. Reduce the workload: The curriculum should be re-evaluated to ensure that the workload is manageable.
2. Increase support: More counseling services and support groups should be available to students.
3. Provide more resources: The school should provide more resources to help students cope with stress.

I hope that these suggestions will be considered and implemented to help reduce the stress levels of medical students.

Sincerely,

LABOR STRIKE EUPHORUS-Best of the nation's truck drivers and a broad assortment of other workers, including engineers, machinists and technicians, truck mechanics and mechanics working on strike yesterday in the worst outbreak of labor strife in more than a year. The disputes continue primarily on wages. The dolls at Union Terrace amputees triggered universal instances of content and threatened explosive sabotage. Substantial profits are very quickly realized. President Ford was reported to be weighing whether to seek before Congress the backdrop to work in an 8-hour strike-ending period.

CONGENIAL BEGIN TO MOVE-The country's newest and busiest railroad went into service. The new consolidated rail corporation was created by Congress, and bankrupt and declining railroads. Its managers promised a "rebirth" of rail service. The new corporation was created by the nation's railroads to service the farmers and industry of the nation. The trucking companies with whom railroads compete were not to be included in the scope of the new corporation.

SOVIET AND CUBAN HELP SOUGHT-A Rhodesian black nationalist leader was given or loaned $2 billion in funds, to rehabilitate essential rail freight service in service. The new consolidated rail corporation was created by Congress, and bankrupt and declining railroads. Its managers promised a "rebirth" of rail service. The new corporation was created by the nation's railroads to service the farmers and industry of the nation. Penn's CREW TEAM traditionally does not have a strong showing at the national collegiate competition. This year, however, the Pennsylvania Navy's hard-practicing crews have been challenging some of the top-notch eight man teams from all over the country. The Blue and Silver quartet, under the guidance of Charles Ash, has been doing splendidly in tournaments against some of the nation's top crews. The Blue is determined to prove itself that it can hold its own against the better teams in the country.

The LASSOON STREET BULLIES have been trying to maintain their inconsistency since Chairman Bumpsy reached the number 8 slot on the national collegiate competition. The team, which is comprised of the best players from all over the country, has been struggling to find a consistent rhythm.
But with the arrival of new players, the team is looking to improve its efficiency and consistency in the upcoming tournaments.

Although the annexation of Penn's tennis team is a loss, the team still has a strong showing in the Ivy League. The Purple and Gold have the environment more suitable for playing winning tennis. With their home court, they have been able to put up a strong showing this season.
According to Coach Bob Hays, "We only play six games on the road all season, so this is a very important weekend for us."
