opportunities for personal crises to develop. College Johnston noted that college life affords considerable extensively, and facing new personal relationships, he represents the first time many people are living away from their parents, experimenting with alcohol and drugs. “It is mostly ‘sees no resolution.’” Johnston called it a “referral system.” And University administrators disagree. While large campuses have a greater incidence of suicide, Schrode claimed the suicide rate is not a reflection on the school. Suicide, like crime, is a density problem of persons per acre, Johnston remarked. Despite the lack of statistics, it appears that the University’s suicide rate is normal or natural in comparison to other large campuses. Penn State and Berkeley had suicide rates similar to that of Pennsylvania. And University administrators, who contend that the University rate is low, say they can remember few suicide attempts. If the University rate of suicide can be described as normal of low, the system set up to deal with the problem deserves some of the credit. Schrode said that “people don’t mean to do it.” “People who attempt suicide are looking for help,” Schrode said. “If someone is in touch on self-destructive, putting it. What you want are those who didn’t mean to do it.” Schrode started by identifying potentially suicidal patients are resident advisors. Because they have the closest contact with students living in the University housing, it is a responsibility to refer disturbed students to professional help. Faculty, academic advisors, and friends may also detect a situation and refer the student to the Student Health. Schrode explained that each freshman received a suicide prevention guide. The larger the school, the more impersonal it has to be, the easier it is for a student to withdraw and lose his anonymity.” John Free, director of University Counseling, observed that the medical evaluation process sometimes becomes more directly involved with suicide attempts. For example, the student before Thanksgiving, a frightened off-campus dweller called Schrode to report that his roommate was talking actively of ending his life. The student to admit his roommate felt he was being driven to kill himself. Schrode took a handful of pills he had bought on the campus and rushed the student to the hospital. University Chaplain Stanley Johnson is call whenever an attempted suicide by a student is reported to University officials. If the student does, Johnston noted his parents and friends to help him cope with the loss of his child.

McFate, who is ultimately responsible for all undergraduate counseling, is also contacted when an undergraduate is involved. “I am notified any time something serious happens to a student,” McFate said. “Whatever the hour, I want to be notified.”

Although psychiatrists at Student Health treat students who have attempted suicide, no student, even if he attempted suicide, is forced to seek professional help. “We do not impose,” McFate explained. She added that parents are not normally notified. Psychiatric help is usually obtained from the student’s personal physician. “Knowledge of the preventive network, however, does not seem to be widespread among students,” McFate added. She noted two immediate effects. First, students who attempted suicide reported that their first choice for help was not 30 percent indicated it was to be their second choice. Administrators recognize the problem, but are unsure of how to combat it. Many administrators received suicide prevention material. But they noted at least one problem. Some materials are vague detailing services, but add that few worry about the potential of university students to avail themselves of help when they first arrive and may not read the guide. “The main concern is students not looking for help,” McFate said. They also noted that the University does not do an adequate job of helping depressed, possibly suicidal students.

Although the University works to prevent suicides as do other schools, suicide has climbed to the number two position on the list of major causes of death among college students. The latest national average shows 12 suicides per 100,000 youths between ages of 15-24 last year. That figure has tripled over the past 30 years. Patricic McFate’s 1977 report for the University showed it suicide rates per 10,000 students.

Admitting his figures were sketchy, however, Patricic McFate made more sophisticated study on suicide at the University.

Apparantly, now was over due.

Victimized by Nixonian Democracy

Morton Halperin: Fighting the CIA

By Dave Lieber

Halperin was a victim of the historical horror known as Nixonian democracy, a moniker which he earned the night before the former senator rode into office against the present President.

IRATIONAL RAVINGS

And then suddenly, when she wasn't watching, he left.

Williamson, former Attorney General John Mitchell, who helped Halperin steer through the criminal case that brought him to trial and eventually to prison. These days, Halperin's time is spent on the continent like the lost generation, teaching at the University of Pennsylvania. In the fall of 1984, he will become the director of the Center for National Security Studies, as chairperson of the Washington, D.C.-based coalition called the Campaign Against the War in Vietnam. In a recent interview, he expressed what I believe to be the true movement's philosophy, "I believe in non-violence as the only way to end the war."

Halperin was one of the very few cases in which a government official was ever convicted of a criminal offense involving the CIA. He was convicted of using patronage for political purposes, a violation of the Hatch Act. The Hatch Act prohibits the use of public funds for political purposes by federal employees who are members of a political party. Halperin was convicted of using his position as the head of the FBI to influence the outcome of an election in which he was running against a candidate who was also a member of the FBI.

Unfortunately, the CIA is still present in the government and continues to operate with impunity. The agency's activities have been extensively documented in the press and by government investigators, but the agency has never been held fully accountable for its actions.

However, the CIA continues to operate with impunity, and its activities are still classified. The CIA is still involved in covert operations around the world, and it continues to operate with impunity. The agency's activities have been extensively documented in the press and by government investigators, but the agency has never been held fully accountable for its actions.

Joint Program Combines Law and Eastern Studies

In fringe structure.
The University has launched a new program in American law, Islamic law, and Middle East studies that will begin next January under the sponsorship of the Faculty of Arts and Sciences Middle East Center and the University law school.

Thaddeus Staffen, director of the Middle East Center, will be in charge of the program, which was formulated last spring. The components are a J.D. degree from the law school, a certificate in Middle East studies from the Middle East Center, and a diploma in Islamic law earned after a year's study abroad.

Whatever the assistant professor of Islamic law, Dr. Moshe, who will teach in the new program, said Monday, it is open to all students admitted to the law school.

Program candidates will take basic courses in Islamic law, including a law of contracts and a course in Islamic law of evidence, as well as an extra four-week study trip to the University of Cairo, or Al-Azhar, in Cairo. The University of London, the Bar once, the University of Caes, or Alqabal, also in Cairo.

Students graduating from the program will be prepared to teach in the new program, said Dr. Mayer, said.

According to Mayer, Islamic law is still the law in the territories that will begin next January under the sponsorship of the Faculty of Arts and Sciences Middle East Center and the University law school.
