Behind Our Murky Middle East Policy

By Mark D. Seltzer

As a group of us engaged in the usual freewheeling conversation one recent midnight, the conversation turned to the latest current news item: the Middle East crisis: the crises that sprang from the ongoing conflict between Israel and its Arab neighbors. The question then was: Does the United States have a policy toward the Middle East?

Despite what some may believe, the answer is an unqualified yes. The United States has a policy toward the Middle East, and it is a policy that we should be proud of.

In fact, the United States has been at the forefront of efforts to resolve the Middle East conflict for many years. The United States has been a leader in promoting peace talks between Israel and the Palestinians, and has worked tirelessly to bring about a two-state solution to the crisis.

Unfortunately, this policy has not always been well-received. Some have accused the United States of bias towards Israel, while others have criticized our efforts as too dictatorial. But regardless of these criticisms, the United States has been a steadfast democracy that has been working hard to bring about peace in the Middle East.

Despite these efforts, however, there are still many obstacles to overcome. The situation in the region is complex and ever-changing, and it will take the efforts of many countries and organizations to bring about lasting peace.

Nevertheless, the United States remains committed to its policy towards the Middle East, and we will continue to work tirelessly to bring about a lasting peace in the region.

Sparkling Stickwomen Sweep Swarthmore, 9-3

BY CAITLIN TAURER

The Penn women's lacrosse team swept Swarthmore yesterday, 9-3, in the Quakers' fourth game of the season. The six goals, against 46 shots, and the 10 ground balls were all at home giving the women's lacrosse team its fifth win, and second in a row, and maintains the Quakers' unusual defensive set-up.

"It was totally a team effort," said Quaker co-captain Gus Jarvis. "Everyone played well. We had to move the ball out of the zone, and our defense was very strong. As for our offense, we were very efficient, and we can still get better." The Quakers and Swarthmore played excellently, according to Jarvis. "Our defense was great as a whole, but we still have to work on our shooting. I think we have a team with the potential to win every game, and we can continue to get better." Jarvis added that the Quakers played a great game, and that the next four games, against Colgate, Yale, Temple, and Franklin and Marshall are all at home giving the Quakers the favorable home field advantage.

"We get better every game," added Pasquariello. "Our defense was great as a whole, but we still have to work on our shooting. I think we have a team with the potential to win every game, and we can continue to get better." Jarvis added that the Quakers played a great game, and that the next four games, against Colgate, Yale, Temple, and Franklin and Marshall are all at home giving the Quakers the favorable home field advantage.
