Gregorian Reflects Upon a Controversial Semester

B. RICK STEVENSON

At 9:30 on the morning of September 15, Trimmie Christmas Paul talked with Vartan Gregorian, the College's president, to discuss the future of the arts at the University. Gregorian had made it known to the Trimmie Christmas Paul that he would not return to the University this coming year due to personal reasons. The decision was a personal one and was made in the best interest of the University.

Gregorian, reflecting on his time at the University, said that he had been very happy with the decision. He had been able to work closely with the University's administration and faculty, and to see the University grow and develop. He had also been able to travel extensively and to meet many interesting people.

However, Gregorian also expressed some concern about the University's future. He said that he had been concerned about the University's budget, and that he had been unable to address this issue during his time as president.

"The University has a lot of challenges ahead," Gregorian said. "I think that the University needs a strong leader who can address these challenges and provide stability." He added that he did not have the time or resources to continue as president, and that he had decided to step down in order to devote his energies to other projects.

Borner said that he was looking forward to working with Gregorian on other projects in the future. He said that Gregorian had been very helpful in working to develop the University's arts programs, and that he had been a valuable member of the University community.

"Vartan Gregorian has been a great asset to the University," Borner said. "He has been a great supporter of the arts, and he has been a great advocate for the University. We are going to miss him greatly."

There Will Always Be Stars, Except in Cities

By Matt Cohen

Minneapolis, Minn. — They are stars, but you can't see them on the skyline of Minneapolis.

The University of Minnesota is where you can find them. They are the students who are not on campus, the ones who are on the road and the ones who are working. They are the ones who are missing the home games and the ones who are missing the classes.

But the University of Minnesota is not a city. It is a place where you can find stars. They are the ones who are missing the home games and the ones who are missing the classes. They are the ones who are missing the home games and the ones who are missing the classes.

DePaul Computer System

CHICAGO — Two suburban teens who allegedly sent messages that shut down DePaul University's computer research work, police said.

"They did it because everyone said it was cool," the郊 student who was identified as Dennis DeLong, an 18-year-old junior at Glenbard High School, was charged with criminal mischief.

"It's pretty straight-forward," said DeLong, who was not identified by authorities, will appear Friday in a Juvenile Court.

DeLong, a computer science major, allegedly helped his fellow student, Brian Callin, 17, of Palatine and a junior at Glenbard West High School, to access the computer system.

"He knew right off the bat the system is pretty open," said DeLong.

After reviewing the data of the computer's hardware, police found a message on a computer terminal saying, "If you don't do it right, we'll shut you down again."

The threat apparently referred to a pre-taped computer program, which monitors one computer language to another, Ellis said such "software" is normally worth from $300 to $600.

When police arrived, who found a telephone number the pirates left on the computer, the students had already shut down DePaul's computer network.

A male student living in the dorm where DeLong and Callin are roommates received a call Thursday night from a student who had discovered the pirates' prank.

Called about the ramifications for the students, "Not like the Whammy thing."

Failed and renewed as the computer system down, Ellis said.

Further investigation into the situation indicated that advisory group members were trying to access the DePaul computer system, Ellis said.

When the students were identified, the students were charged with criminal mischief.
