English 101 is a different class this year. No one is certain whether the change is for the better, but one thing is certain — the change was not planned.

In last year's version of Topics in Film, three popular tests in the topic were used as required readings. But over the summer, all three books went out of print.

"It is a new course," Professor Betty Erkkila said last week.

Since the late 1960s, an increasing number of texts have gone the way of the books used by Eckels, as publishers around the country seek to translate profits in an increasingly volatile market.

More and more, university presses are producing their own texts, often with faculty input.

The university has heard the complaints and, in addition to more general English

Sisters Share in Sorority Living

by D.J. von Bulow

Sisters who share in sorority living and fellow students see it also as fulfilling when they come to the University.

Many students enjoy the benefits of a close-knit living environment as they make the transition from high school to college. Sometimes, however, the bonds formed during this period are stronger than those formed outside the sorority.

"I think sororities are on the verge of being a dying breed," said one member of the three residence halls on campus that are owned by Greek fraternities.

"I mean, we don't want to see them die out," she added. "But there are some things that need to be done to make them more appealing to younger students.

One member of the Alpha Xi Delta chapter said that sororities can suffer from a lack of leadership and a lack of direction.

"It seems as though they're just sort of drifting along," she said. "We need someone to come in and take charge and really make a difference.

"Sororities are a great way to meet new people and to get involved in campus life," she added. "But they can also be a lot of work.

"I think the biggest problem is finding the right balance between social and academic activities," she said. "People are always looking for new ways to balance their time and to get involved in different things.

Con-sultation Yet Again

The consequence of the agreement signed by Presi- dent Leland M. Buck and student leaders at the end of February's College Hall in fact that "all members of the Illinois student body will have an opportunity to meet the president later." However, the dates and times of these meetings have not been announced.

It is of course not clear whether the "all students involved in any way with the controversy" mentioned in the agreement will be included in these meetings. It is also not clear whether the president will have a role in these meetings, or whether they will be run by student leaders.

The agreement itself has been criticized by some students and faculty members as inadequate and insufficient. However, the University has made no public statement about whether it will support or oppose the agreement.

Responses to Novak

Many students and faculty members have responded to Susan Novak's article on the Daily Penn man page. Some have supported her views, while others have criticized them.

One student commented that Novak's article was "a call to action" and that "the University needs to do more to address the issues she raised." Another student agreed, saying that "Novak's article was thoughtful and well-written,
and it made an important contribution to the debate.

On the other hand, some students and faculty members have criticized Novak's article, saying that it was "biased" and "one-sided." One faculty member wrote that Novak's article was "a potentially harmful piece of writing" and that it was "inappropriate for a publication of the University of Pennsylvania.

Despite these mixed reactions, it is clear that Novak's article has sparked important discussions on issues of race and gender at the University of Pennsylvania.

To the Editor,

I am writing to express my strong disapproval
of Susan Novak's article on the Daily Penn man page. Her article is not only biased and one-sided, but also harmful to the University community. The article ignores important diversity issues and perpetuates harmful stereotypes.

It is important that we have open and honest conversations about diversity and inclusion on our campus. Novak's article is not helpful in this regard and I urge the University to take steps to address the issues she raises.

Two Streakers Stun Wharton Women

By STEVAN LAVISH

The Wharton Women's International Affairs Committee, the student body's governing council, has announced a pilot program that might soon be found on every college campus: a streaking program.

"It's a pilot program, designed to introduce students to the idea that there is a whole world of things to do," said Dr. How, Director of International Affairs.

The program, which is open only to registered students, was announced at a meeting of the committee on March 9, 1974.

Dr. How explained that the program was developed in response to the increasing number of international students who are enrolled at Wharton and who are looking for opportunities to become more involved in the campus community.

"We hope these students will feel more at home on campus," said Dr. How. "It's important that they feel welcome and that they are able to participate in the activities of the college.

Foreign students will be able to live in fraternity houses under a plan developed by the Interfraternity Council and the Foreign Students Affairs Committee.

The line was great — I had all kinds of things to do and still was able to kontrol the defense. Our offense was working out there, you can't complain. We had a great defense. The Quakers may not have put all the points on the board they should have been able to, but given the eight starters on the offensive and defensive lines, we were a damn good football team.

The other side of the ball was no less impressive. You saw the things we were capable of, but we still didn't perform at our peak.

It was total domination by the Quakers. It was exactly as it was in 1976 had the Jinx been broken.
