Students to help lure minorities

By AMES ALEXANDER

The leaders of the Undergraduate Assembly, United Minority Council and Alpha Tau Omega said yesterday that they are interested in encouraging new voters to apply to the University for admission.

"UConn is a very diverse institution and we want students to vote in the November election," said UConn President Richard Fenton. "We would be approved, allowing the unprocessed forms to be directed to City Hall."

Treasurer David Dormont brought up initially blocked processing of the forms of students who live in the Quadrangle, charging them to apply to the University and convincing those who are interested to continue.

City accepts registration forms from new voters in Quadrangle

The City Commissioner’s office has accepted about 120 registration forms from students who live in the Quadrangle, where several thousand people voted yesterday.

"I am happy to report that we have processed all of the forms that have been returned," said City Commissioner Robert Driscoll. "We have also received some additional forms that will be processed today."

The research plans of several scientists are being questioned because of their apparent interest in the mechanics of tennis. The scientists, who are working on the mechanics of the tennis swing, have been criticized for their lack of attention to the mechanics of other sports.

"We are not interested in the mechanics of tennis," said one scientist. "We are interested in the mechanics of all sports."

The University's judicial procedures have been investigated by the Pennsylvania Commission on Higher Education. The investigation was prompted by a complaint from a student who was expelled from the University for violating the student conduct code.

"We were concerned about the way the University was handling this case," said Commissioner Finch. "We wanted to make sure that the student was treated fairly and that the University was following its own procedures."

The University's much-anticipated movie showings were well-received by students. Many students said that they enjoyed the new movie showings, which were more diverse and included more minority representation.

"I think the new movie showings are a great improvement," said student John Smith. "I enjoyed the new movies and I'm looking forward to seeing more diversity in the future."

Laurens Ellsworth, a Wharton junior, was one of the youngest students to sign up to the Warren School's Students for a Separate Peace (SfSP) movement. In the wake of the Vietnam War, many young people were restless with the government and were taking political action, to prevent the United States from getting involved.

There are no conflicts currently that the student is involved in, but the Wharton junior said that if he were involved, he would be interested in political action.

Ellsworth also added that he has a sense of concern for political action, but he also said that he would be interested in political action if there were a conflict currently.

"I have a sense it's not a very popular philosophy."

'Basic Human Decency' Not Alien to Fraternities

To the Editor:

I am writing in reply to the "pro-martial" article in the Daily Pennsylvanian, June 2. I believe that the writer is completely out of line in criticizing the fraternities. I was considerably offended by his comments and find it hard to believe that anyone could have written this article.

First of all, I would like to ask why the writer was not surprised at the way the Los Angeles area was portrayed. I feel it was highly unfair to bring in an area such as Los Angeles to help prove the writer's point. Most people would expect something to happen in Los Angeles, given the atmosphere of the city. Why couldn't this incident have happened in any other city?

I would also like to point out that the writer's claims about fraternities are completely baseless. It is not the fraternities' fault that there are some criminals in the world. It is the fault of the individuals who commit these crimes.

Please consider the possibility that the writer may simply be trying to write an inflammatory article to gain attention. I believe that the writer's comments are not only incorrect, but also extremely insensitive.

Sincerely,

U.S. Spies See Russia.

To the Editor:

The last page of the "top-secret" article, "We Are In Corunia," was most disturbing. It appears to me that the government is using the spies to obtain vital information and then discrediting them for their efforts.

I am concerned that the government is not doing enough to protect the spies. It seems to me that the government is only interested in the information that they can obtain, regardless of the risk to the spies.

I urge the government to take action to protect the spies and to make sure that their efforts are not in vain.

Sincerely,

Researchers link unions, violence
Wharton report calls for legislative reform

By RUTH ZIFF
Two researchers in the Wharton School's Industrial Relations Center have written a book linking labor violence and political violence.

"There can be no remaining doubt that labor violence is a real and continuing problem," the book's authors say. "It is a problem that the nation, its employers, its unions, and its labor policies must face if they are to be effective in curbing labor violence."

The book, titled "Violence: The Record and The Future," is based on a 540-page study of labor violence in the U.S. that was published earlier this year.

The authors, Thomas Thibault and Richard Trumka, say their book is the first to provide a comprehensive analysis of labor violence and its effects. They say their study is based on interviews with union leaders, workers, and other experts.

"The book is the result of a 10-year effort to bring together all available information on labor violence," Thibault said. "It is the most comprehensive study of labor violence ever conducted.

The book is divided into two parts: Part I, "Violence in the Workplace," and Part II, "Violence in the Community." Part I focuses on the causes of labor violence, while Part II examines the consequences of labor violence.

The authors say their book is intended for policymakers, researchers, and anyone interested in labor issues.

"This book is a must-read for anyone interested in labor issues," Trumka said. "It is an important contribution to the debate about labor violence.

The book is available for $29.95 from the Wharton School Press. Proceeds from the sale of the book will be used to support further research on labor violence.

The authors also urge policymakers to consider the findings of their study when making decisions about labor policy.

"We believe that this book provides important insights into the causes and consequences of labor violence," Thibault said. "Policymakers should consider these findings when making decisions about labor policy.

Two University professors spent the last week of October in Colorado. One of the professors, Professor Alan Glith- thers, and another, Professor Edward Webber, both from the University’s School of Education, were there to study the schools in the Denver area as part of a broader research project. The study, which was part of a larger project on educational reform, aimed to identify best practices in schools and strategies for improving educational outcomes.

The researchers spent time observing classrooms, discussing educational strategies with teachers and principals, and conducting interviews with students and parents. They also reviewed school documents and data to gain a comprehensive understanding of the schools’ operations and performance.

According to the researchers, the schools in the Denver area were diverse in terms of demographics and educational outcomes. Some schools had high rates of student achievement, while others faced significant challenges in meeting educational standards.

The researchers found that successful schools had several common characteristics, including a strong commitment to improving student outcomes, effective leadership, and a supportive school culture. They also emphasized the importance of involving parents and community members in the educational process.

The study’s findings will be shared with school leaders, policymakers, and educators to help inform future educational reform efforts. The researchers hope that their work will contribute to a deeper understanding of the factors that influence student success and provide insights for improving educational outcomes for all students.
