Pre-med fears: many of them are unnecessary

R. GAINHAM AND FREDY

Robert said: "I am no pre-med student. I have decided that I want to be a doctor when I was in high school. I took all the classes that were necessary to get into medical school and I have been accepted to the University of Pennsylvania because I had 6.0. I have a good pre-med program. I have done everything that I supposed to do."

He took math and chemistry and he feels that he is English in the first rank. He has been involved in many activities. He has helped a lot of people and that medical-school liked that.

Robert also works hard in French. He said: "I have to work hard in French. I want to be a good doctor. I have a lot of exams to take."

He has found 15 percentage of required science courses, seven lab hours, a year-long application process.

The only problem is that Robert heard that there are places in the medical school where candidates have to take the same exams as the undergraduates. He has taken many exams, but he is worried whether he can become a doctor.

The pressures of learning medicine have been increased, but he has been involved in many activities. He has helped a lot of people."

Medical school admissions officers often say that this is not necessary. Robert and thousands of other university students are beginning to think that the large number of science courses is one reason why students have to give up so much.

One concern in the pre-med stress is the amount of time which makes good doctors. Several studies have been done which indicate that current undergraduate requirements are not necessary.

At the University of Pennsylvania, Robert reported, that a big change is being made in order to help good students.

"I think we need to help good students. I have a lot of exams to take."

The night before his first exam, he said: "I have a lot of exams to take. I have to work hard in French."

A Classic Bond

Wharton alums Leonard and Ronald Lauder had shared their father's deep concern over the power erosion of the international business elite. Mr. Lauder had noted that it took more than a sound background in economics, finance, management and other business programs to deal effectively with the goals and needs of a rapidly changing world. In order to ensure a thorough understanding of history, language and customs was imperative. The result of this vision and generosity of the Lauder family was an annual event last week: the Leonard J. Lauder Institute of Management and International Studies.

Located in the one of the largest and most influential student centers in the business world, the institute, will seek to produce graduates with a broad knowledge of international concerns as well as a business know-how.

Join Vigil For Exiled Soviet Jew

To the Editor:

During the October 14 Vigil for Exiled Soviet Jews, about 50 SDS members, student government officials, and faculty members demonstrated in solidarity with the illegal imprisonment of Jewish public figures in the Soviet Union. The demonstration took place in front of the Lauder Institute.

The demonstration was organized by a coalition that nearl> convinced the Soviet government to free all the prisoners. The Soviet government has repeatedly denied the existence of illegal detention of Soviet Jews. The demonstration was held to show support for the Soviet Jewish prisoners and to call attention to the issue of human rights in the Soviet Union.

The demonstration was attended by a wide range of people, including SDS members, faculty members, and students from other universities. The protest was met with a strong police presence, but the demonstrators remained peaceful throughout the event.

Quotation of the Day

"We're here in solidarity with the Soviet Jews who are being denied their basic human rights, to demand that the Soviet government release all political prisoners and put an end to the RequestOptionsabuse of human rights in the Soviet Union. We hope that the world will pay attention to this issue and that the Soviet government will take action to improve the situation of the Soviet Jews."

In an April evening last spring, the Georgia Board of Education voted to have the Online government reorganized into a more student-friendly format. The move was said to be in response to student concerns about the government's lack of representation and participation.

The move met with mixed reactions from students and faculty. Some praised the decision for its potential to create a more inclusive government, while others expressed concern about the potential for it to lead to a decrease in student engagement.

On the day of the vote, the Online government was dissolved, and a new government structure was put into place. The new government included a student representative for each grade level, as well as a faculty advisor.

Support for Kahane Highlights Dangers

Proposers of a proposal to support Kahane in the upcoming elections are advocating for a renewed support for Kahane's political party. The proposal is gaining traction among some members of the political elite and the public, but it is also raising concerns about the potential for increased violence and discrimination.

Proponents of the proposal argue that supporting Kahane is necessary to prevent a rise in violence and discrimination against the Jewish community. They argue that Kahane is the only political party that can effectively protect the interests of the Jewish community.

Opponents of the proposal argue that supporting Kahane will only lead to an increase in violence and discrimination. They argue that Kahane is a hate group and that supporting it will only empower it.

The proposal has sparked a heated debate among the political elite and the public. It is not clear what the outcome of the debate will be, but it is certain that the issue will continue to be a major topic of discussion in the coming weeks.

GAPSA, GSAC: Working Together

GAPSA and GSAC have been working together for this issue. They have held a number of meetings and have developed a joint strategy for addressing the problem. The two organizations have also been working on a number of other initiatives, such as supporting student organizations and promoting diversity on campus.

Students, faculty praise Pappas selections

By ELANA HARLOW

University students and faculty members said yesterday that they are excited about the potential and un-counseled nature of the next Pappas Fellow, former Secretary of Defense Rob McNamara.

President Franklin B. H.isNullOrEmptyen declared that McNamara is a "superb candidate" and his potential to bring "controversial" issues to campus.

"McNamara has written extensively in the past year about problems of nuclear war and weaponry as well as problems and efforts in the Third World. He has done more for Third World advancement than any other person in his lifetime," McNamara, who will visit the University February 13-17, served under President John F. Kennedy,

Secretary of Defense and served as chief of the United States'

Vietnam War policy. He was the President of the World Bank from 1968-1971, where he accelerated the development of the Third World.

And it is currently active in advancing a "non-attributable to"

policy of nuclear arms by countries in the north.

"The purpose of the Pappas

Fellow is to award the Nobel Prize," College House Coordinator

Randy Bates said. "It's to offer an opportunity, for debate and discussion. We're not bringing McNamara in simply because he is an opportunity for debate and discussion."

SSJS vigil to protest the violation of refuseniks

By SUSAN MATTISON

Students at the University of Pennsylvania and Temple University will join a national vigil to show solidarity with Yosef Begun, a political prisoner in the Soviet Union. The vigil will mark the imprisonment of Begun, a member of the Soviet liberal opposition movement, since last year in prison and fifteen years in a labor camp. Begun was imprisoned for two years of his life in Siberia on the charge of perestroika — being allegedly unfavorable and living off the Soviet state. After he was released, Begun returned to his job in Moscow only to be re-arrested three more years later for his political activity.

Begun has turned Hebrew and Russian to his Hindi in 1980. The vigil is a new proposal for Sweden's anti-communist policy. Kaplan said, "Before 1979, the Soviet disengaged anti-Semitism in the Jewish community. After 1979, the disengaged anti-Semitism in the Jewish community will be a non-partisan discussion. Captain's goal gives Field Hockey 2-1 win

The Quaker women's field hockey team scored the game-winning goal in the second half to secure the victory. The goal was scored by captain Donna Berk, who received a pass from teammate Kristen Kersten. Berk made a strong move to the goal and scored on a shot from close range. The goal was the difference in the game and gave the Quakers a 2-1 lead. The penalty stroke was awarded to Berk after a player from the opposing team was called for a foul. Berk made the most of the opportunity and scored the goal. The Quakers will look to build on this win as they continue their season. The next game is on Saturday against Columbia. It's a big game for both teams, and the Quakers will be looking to continue their winning streak.
