The storm hit Pennsylvania late Friday night, bringing a mix of rain and snow to the area.

"There was very little damage," said one student. "We were blessed that our dorms didn't have windows." The University's safety staff worked throughout the night to ensure the safety of students and staff. Despite the damage, the University was able to remain open with minimal disruption.

WHO WILL REPRESENT THE WOMAN OF THE '80s?

By LAURA SHAW and KAREN WEINTRAUB

The result of the campus's social movement has been a women's movement. Now a stepping-stone to larger efforts, and in turn giving new life to the dormant campus women's movements. The Penn Women's Alliance, the only formal undergraduate women's organization, is a small group which aims to change the way females are perceived on campus.

Last year, the Alliance held a successful Officers' Orientation for all new female students attending Penn. As a result, the organization is more energetic and difficult for us to not always show the effect," said Alliance member Sarah Valentine, a senior.

Though the group has been relatively inactive in recent months, members say their organization is not a measure of limitations in schools. "You can't judge the number of the movement on campus by the size of the Women's Alliance," said Alliance member Kathy Signori.

Bringing her work that while women's rights are often overlooked, only education will change them.

"As a feminist, I'm interested in seeing others know that sexism exists — institutionalized female subordination and male domination," the Penn Women's Alliance member said.

"Education is so important," she added. "If you can't change people's attitudes in college, when will you ever be able to change them? I feel confident once you get here, you don't forget it."

"I think there's a real concern for the Penn women's movement to continue and expand for the future of the group," she said yesterday that the campus women's movement has been growing in magnitude for the women in attendance.

"It's important to recognize the role that the Penn women's movement has played and will continue to play in dealing with the issues of sexism," she added.

"Penn women were probably very instrumental in the initial discussions which led to the creation of the Women's Movement," she said. "They want to create an overall awareness of women's issues.

"I feel outnumbered — that's my duty as a woman to get on the bandwagon for the women," she said.

"I think I think a lot of the women feel bad about being radicals, but only a few will speak out," said Diamond. "That those do are being pushed out of radicalism just by being expressing themselves.

Other people for fear of feminist concerns are Women's Studies classes. In those enrollment, students have a chance to study and bypass courses which often women's movement.

"I as a woman see a lot of sexism in the world, and I don't see Penn as any exception.

"The campus women's movement is much like the women's movement nationally and internationally. Over the past 10 years we have seen some successes and we've seen some setbacks and this is to be expected because in any social movement there will be resistance to change."
Penn Course Review is back after taking a 1-year hiatus

By LAURA OWEN
The Undergraduate Course Guide will be published in the following fall semester.

The 1984 edition of the book, a compilation of student course evaluation forms, will be taken out of production. Penn Course Review Editor Rod Rosenstein said that the organization is trying to reinstate it after last fall's success.

"The staff broke down last year," said Rosenstein. "It was a staff of 50 percent seniors, and a few were doing the majority of it. I don't think we're going to be doing it at the same level as last year." Rosenstein added that the book is not going to be published by the Undergraduate Course Review.

"It's a good way to introduce students to the world that he has fire insurance," said Rosenstein. "He's insured." Of course, if you're a student, you can't just go out and buy fire insurance. You need to get a quote from a company. But if you're going to buy fire insurance, the first thing you should do is make sure you have the right kind of insurance.

"I think a lot of faculty think they have fire insurance," said Rosenstein. "But I think it's important for the students to be aware of how the professors are covered." The whole point is not only to tell professors what to do, but to make sure the professors are being covered.

"The idea is to give students some control over the type of education they are getting."
Phi Sig raises $2000 with party for troubled area fruit vendor

By RUTH MASTERS

At a party sponsored by the Phi Sigma Sigma fraternity last weekend, thanks to $2000 raised by the Sigma Kappa fraternity and Schaumburg Club, a vendor who sold fruit from 8th and Locust Streets, could not attend a work trip after his car broke down and was repaired when he needed it to make the car payments.

Phi Sig President Anton said that his fraternity raised $375, while Sigma Kappa raised $1200, and the Schaumburg Club helped to fill the gap. "We made $500 at the party, and a little just from the sale," said last night. "We're going to kick the donation to the market to make it $2000 and help them to get their business back up."

The event was held at 1303 37th and Locust Streets, could not exhibit generosity. "The Sigma Kappa fraternity this weekend. We're looking for either a used car, which we can buy outright as a down payment," said recent graduate and Sigma Kappa member, "and we'd like to sell it to the winner of the program, so that we can give it back to the fraternity.

"We were talking with the Epfs — the English Professors — about students, and they said that their students wanted to help. So we decided to put on a dance, which will provide matching funds," Anton said. "It's an opportunity for the Sigma Kappa fraternity to give something to a broader cause." Smith suggested that if the brothers will help Sigma Kappa to get a new car. "We're looking for either a used car, which we can buy outright as a down payment," said recent graduate and Sigma Kappa member, "and we'd like to sell it to the winner of the program, so that we can give it back to the fraternity.

Sometimes a party is held for more than an hour before they leave. "We had a dance from about 11:30 until about 2 o'clock in the morning." Smith was quick to add: "We couldn't have done it without the help of the Sigma Kappa fraternity and the Schaumburg Club.

For once a new university administrator is not stepping into a job from a position of strength. At What's In (Athletic) Affairs Director Paul Rubincam officially becomes the athletic director, the University's Department of Athletics has equally workable facilities as respectably programs in baseball and basketball, and women's track and field. The teams are in pretty good shape, and the University doesn't have any coaches with winning records in their hands and the press as sadly as Columbus football coach Jim Guttman.

Rubincam takes the athletic director's position with good credentials. As a former University baseball and basketball player and basketball assistant coach, Rubincam has a solid sports background. His experience in liaison between the athletic Department and Administration Office and as an assistant admissions director should give him the knowledge to face the ongoing challenge of recruiting good athletes without losing the University's academic standards or neglecting needy students offered scholarships from non-Ivy League institutions.

Rubincam's proven fund-raising abilities offer hope that he can attract the money needed to improve the facilities. Offense trying to get on track after slow start

The series began on Penn's 22-yard line. The Quakers quarterback pocketed the middle for a gain of 15. Another completed pass, this one to the Spreadsheet, for 12 yards. Penn's effective run game continued, another 12-yard completion to a slot receiver, another 22-yard completion and a six-yard carry. The second half of the first quarter ended.

Was this the play of the 1983 Quakers? Could such strong running and passing continue? The first two series managed only 11 points in two games?

Sacks from Army's defensive line and a missed field goal left Penn lost at the half, 45-3. The final score does not indicate that there were flashes of offensive brilliance such as those described early in the season. The second quarter began, and the Quakers were still unconsolable.

five points, and five for a touchdown. The flashy run back was junior RB Chris Constantine, who accounted for 47 of the 48 yards gained in the series. Such performances do not seem to have a place in a 45-3 loss.

One offensive line is still inconsistent, Penn head coach Tony Clark said. "We nocked the ball very well, but then all of a sudden, we'd break down and lose two of Army's three yard runs. They are balanced on long lapses of consistence, but we were so close, but still so far away.

Such performances do not indicate that the 1983 Quakers offense has been facing teams of brilliance. There are flashes of brilliance. But they have been balanced by a lack of consistency. "One offense is still inconsistent," Penn head coach Tony Clark said. "We nocked the ball very well, but then all of a sudden, we'd break down. Too much "duck and cover" football." Military engineers said that Army's fast, aggressive defense was better than the offense, but the offense has no confidence in itself.

The second half was 17-3 in favor of the visitors, but it still appeared as though the Quakers could provide a strong challenge. But Army capitalized on Penn's mistakes, going 54 yards for a touchdown. Criscione came back and started to resent the Quakers — but again, the game was over. And then the game came back.

PENN'S BIDE. Heideperson Army hark- back William Lapsley during Saturday's game.

The Quakers' only successful drive of the second, third or fourth ones, for that matter. What there was, however, was some conservative play calling. The first offensive series ended with a fumble that gave Army the turnover. The first drive ended with a punt that gave the ball away to the Quakers. The second drive ended with a fumble that gave Army the turnover. The third drive ended with a punt that gave the ball away to the Quakers. The fourth drive ended with a punt that gave the ball away to the Quakers. The fifth drive ended with a punt that gave the ball away to the Quakers. The sixth drive ended with a punt that gave the ball away to the Quakers. The seventh drive ended with a punt that gave the ball away to the Quakers.

With this kind of treatment from the crowd, it was only the second time. But despite the lack of scoring, this was a game the Quakers should have won. The only thing that was wrong with this game was the lack of scoring.
