Columbia students protest possible loss of need-blind admissions

By JORDANA HORN
Daily Pennsylvanian Staff Writer

Approximately 200 students at Columbia University took over an office Monday to protest an administrative proposal to limit undergraduate financial aid and possibly eliminate the university's need-blind admissions policy.

The students held a rally against a plan to be considered by arts and sciences faculty members that could lead to cuts in financial aid and possibly a Latino voting district for Ortiz.

CABDRIVER ROBS VISITOR OUTSIDE ER

A cab driver robbed a visitor at gunpoint in front of the Hospital of the University of Pennsylvania Emergency Room on 33rd Street yesterday. University Sergeant Michael Fink said the would-be robber took from a cab driver $127 in cash and a pair of gold-rimmed glasses. The victim described the robber as a "lanky man" between 5'7" and 5'8" tall with a "V"-shaped face.

In an untoward incident, University Police stopped a cab driver and arrested a man on the 36th floor of Alpha House, located at 2604 Spruce Street.

University Police received a report of a burglary in progress at 4:30 a.m. Friday.

When they arrived on the scene, the police apprehended a man holding various items he had apparently attempted to steal.

University Police eventually took an officer to the West Side to perform a drug test.

The resident of the building who reported the crime is a male University student. Another male University student also supported the police in this matter.

In another untoward incident, police arrested a woman who had attempted suicide on the front steps of the 3600 block of Walnut Street at 11:55 p.m. Wednesday night.

Philadelphia Police believe the woman to be the same woman in the prior incident. She is being evaluated at the Psychiatric Hospital.

"This is probably not a student," said police. A rape was also reported near the 3600 block of Summit Street yesterday. The police have arrest warrants for failure to appear in court.

Two female shoplifters were taken to the University's non-discrimination policy with respect to students from participating in the University's non-discrimination policy. There have been no resulting arrests from the events of yesterday.

It would be hypocritical of the University to not arrest a person on campus.

We should have the freedom of choice to make decisions on our own.

As marriages decreased, more non-married couples began living together. "Sharp declines in both first-marriage rates and rates of remarriage have been largely offset by increasing cohabitation," the article stated. Claire Rauscher, a 1970 College graduate and Assistant Professor of Public Defender, and her husband, David Rauscher, a 1975 Wharton graduate, are an example of this type of change.

"We lived with a revolving door policy," Claire Rauscher stated. Upon graduation, they rented an apartment together in Philadelphia, and they bought a house some time later. The day they moved in, they decided to get married, she added. If they did not move in together, they said the relationship would not simply peter out. "We lived with a revolving door policy," Claire Rauscher stated.

During the 1960s and 1970s, men and women were equally interested in entering into serious relationships. During his senior year, he was interested in her. She was a senior at the time. They began dating at the Freshman Dance. An additional reason for staying together demands less sexual faithfulness than marriage.

"Can you imagine any better way to get people married than to send them off to college?" he asked. This philosophy, still prevalent today, is one reason they were living with their partner.

"You might say it's a cultural hangover." Not only did many men propose to women, they generally proposed to the women. Many college students do not tend to marry. Medical student Ken Grimm, 1970, and his wife, Michelle Grimm said only a few graduates marry, and her husband, Richard Schulberg, had just graduated from New York University Medical School and still needed parental help in financial affairs.

"We didn't decide," Richard Spiegel laughed, "The Lord decided." Timing for having children has been pretty much the same during the past several decades, Morgan said.

"The 1990s' road to marriage is a completely different reality. Now, not only do most undergraduates marry against marriage, most graduate and medical students do too. Students, said Michelle Grimm, said medical students do not intend to marry until their third or fourth year. Even then, there are only a few couples that marry.

The reason the Grimms chose to marry was they did not want to be apart during the few more years of schooling they have at the University.

In the 1990s, many more couples are living together before they get married, and even without planning to get married. Within the homosexual community, where marriage is not legally feasible, seems to live together as an alternative for marriage. However, many gay couples would like to see some form of legal recognition of their relationships. Assistant Director of Student Life, Robert Schwebenk said.

As with any living arrangement, commitment varies from relationship to relationship, but many gay couples would like to see formal recognition of their relationships. "I would consider myself married," said James Cogswell, the co-chairman of Lambda Gays, the Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual Graduate and Professional Association.

According to the study on marriage, cohabitation is less prevalent among college students than it is among persons without high school credentials.

According to the study, most people who are living together say they are making sure to be compatible for marriage. 11 percent of males and 15 percent of females surveyed said this was an important reason they were living with their partner.

Another reason, given by 12 percent of males and 19 percent of females, is that living together demands less sexual faithful-
AIDS forums marked by poor attendance

Two HIV/AIDS Awareness Workshops held yesterday addressed cultural and gender issues, but were marred by poor attendance.

The first workshop was titled "Women and AIDS: Confronting the Issues," and was presented by Professor Cathy Hall. "The purpose of the workshop was to help women realize how race and gender have affected them and to get rid of the myth that AIDS is a disease that affects only men or certain races," Hall said.

"I have been disappointed," Hall said. "I think the message was not received. It was not explained clearly."

The second workshop, "Confronting the Issues of Race and Culture in AIDS," was presented by Dr. Gerald Wright, a sociologist who directs the AIDS Community Education Project at the University of Pennsylvania. "Unfortunately, it was poorly attended," Wright said.

"If it's going to be effective, we need to talk about the cultural difference between the populations we are trying to reach," he said.

Wright said he did not know if he would develop a second workshop, but he said that he was encouraged by the few people who attended.

Wednesday night prospective doctors learned something about work in the real world.

Sponsored by the Career Planing Office, the meeting was held at the Julee Morgan Pre-Health Society, a panel of specialists in various fields of medicine discussed the realities of medical school and general practice.

Three doctors, all of whom are associate professors at the University’s School of Medicine, discussed the difficulties of making the decision to become a doctor and choosing a speciality.

"Students want to know what it’s really like," commented Assistant Director Glicksman. "They want a point of view on their concerns and questions."

The first speaker, Jacobson, who has been the emergency medicine director at University Hospital since the fall of 1992, has been teaching the medical students since he started his position. "I’m not kidding when I tell you that this is the most difficult job I’ve ever done," he said.

"What’s motivating me is being there for students," Jacobson said. "I want to show them that you can have a successful career in medicine, even if it’s not the one you’re planning for."

"When you’re teaching medical students, you have to be honest with them," he continued. "If you can’t be honest with them, you’re not doing your job.

"You can’t tell them that you’re happy with the job you’re doing," he added. "You have to be realistic about what it’s like.

"You have to be realistic about what it’s like, no matter what you’re doing," he said.

Discriminating Landlord

The issue of on-campus housing for gay and lesbian couples is an example of historically liberal residence policies becoming out of date.

"Who is it?" In the television sitcom "Bosom Buddies," it was Kip and Henry, two men secretly living in the same on-campus room.

The University should consider changing its residence policies. For example, students should be able to live in the same on-campus room as a romantic partner of the same or opposite gender.

Living in same-sex or mixed-gender shared apartments will help students who are gay or lesbian. The University should also consider enforcing the current same-sex living in residence halls policy.

Recent research on gender identity and sexual orientation suggests that gay and lesbian students benefit from living with same-sex peers. Living in a same-sex or mixed-gender shared apartment can reduce feelings of isolation and increase social support for gay and lesbian students.

Furthermore, studies have shown that LGBTQ+ students who live in same-sex or mixed-gender shared apartments are more likely to feel safe and supported, which can positively impact their overall well-being.

Conclusion

The University should consider changing its residence policies to allow for same-sex and mixed-gender shared apartments. This will benefit gay and lesbian students and promote a more inclusive and welcoming campus environment.

Wrestlers hope to upset Cornell

By MATTHEW REISER

In hopes of pulling off a tremendous upset, the Penn wrestlers are gearing up for huge wins over Cornell, according to their coach at the Palais at noon.

The Quakers have been the Ivy League powerhouses for the past few years, clinching Ivy championships from 1987 to 1991. Currently ranked 16th in the nation, Cornell will face a viable opponent in the Penn wrestling team.

Penn, coming off a three-week sweep last weekend at Harvard, Atlanta State and Boston College, is confident in its chances to give Cornell a run for its money.

"This is the first time we've had a chance to compete for an Ivy League title," head coach Roger Pytleski said. "To have our team's growth, this is a strong step.

As for Penn's loss last weekend, it will be looking more for city bragging rights than anything else. Drews is a pity 5-0 but has given the Quakers problems in the past, including an emotional win last year.

"The key to keeping both teams in the mix is aggressive wrestling by the Quakers," he said. "The goal is to compete this week was aggressive."

"Both Drews and Cornell will be up for the match," Pytleski said. "Hopefully, Penn will be up as well because they could be victim to the sweeping efforts Cornell has enjoyed in recent weeks. Winning both dual matches in a row and capturing three Ivy League wins against Harvard, Columbia, and Brown, the Big Red realistically needs no more wins against the Ivy for a shot to wrap up a sixth straight Ivy title."

But with very focused Quaker wrestlers in the mix, Penn looks to trip up Cornell in its run for the title.

Court strikes down blacks-only scholarship

By AYODANA BROWN

A federal appeals court last week struck down a blacks-only scholarship program at the University of Maryland, but University officials said the decision will have no effect on the University and the program.

The Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Va. ruled last Monday that race-based college scholarships for minority students, which are established to correct past discrimination are unconstitutional. Furthermore, the court ruled that at least proof that discrimination at the institution still exists.

The University of Maryland's Benjamin Banneker Scholarship, reserved for black students, was cited in a lawsuit when a Latino student applied for the scholarship and was denied. The student filed a lawsuit against the university.

"We are raising money for programs which are principally directed at minority students and faculty, but are open to the entire University, so they are not race-based," Bagel said, citing the Greenfield International Center and the Center for Academic Success as examples of such programs.

Rick Naten, senior vice president of development and University relations, said that while there is a "substantial amount" of funding for minority programs, the majority of these fellowships are for students with little access to other than specific ethnic groups.

"I'm sure that there are funds which state that students of a specific race or national origin be given, at least, preference," Naten said.

Naten added that the policy of the University's Development and University Relations follows the Department of Education's rules which state that if a donor is interested in restricting a scholarship to a specific category, which would include race-specific scholarships, the University has the right to restrict that scholarship.

"As a law stands, the Maryland ruling is not going to affect us...not because nobody wanted to go for a long shot," Bagel said.

Adrienne Rhodes, Communications Director for the United Negro College Fund, said the court's decision is unconstitutional if there is no significant proof.

"If we're going to look at making race-based scholarships unconstitutional, we should also look at religious-, gender- and geographic-specific scholarships," Rhodes said. The ruling, if followed by other appeals courts, has the potential to eliminate all race-based scholarships nationwide, mainly at state universities and in the South.

However, the possibility remains that the decision will have an impact on private colleges and universities that exist that state that students of a specific race or national origin be given, at least, preference.

But with very focused Quaker wrestlers, Penn hopes to upset Cornell in its run for the title.

U.N. will recommend sending troops to Croatia

UNITED NATIONS — The U.N. secretary-general will soon recommend sending thousands of peacekeepers to war-torn Croatia, and the force is likely to be deployed within weeks, a U.N. official said today.

In a meeting late Wednesday with Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali, Yugoslav Foreign Minister Izetbegovic, U.S. envoy to Yugoslavia, recommended sending a force of 12,000 peacekeepers, diplomats said.

Boutros-Ghali said he would give a recommendation to the Security Council early next week, asking that the force guard the cease-fire.

"Peacekeeping is an essential task for the United Nations," U.S. spokesman Francois Papillon told reporters during a break, "We are not responding, except word, almost" to explain his stories counsel Peter Fleming, said he was asked "word-by-word" during a tense cross-examination by Council spokesman James Smith during which he described such Interrogation as "intimidating" to reporter de- Reporter refuses to reveal Thomas sources

WASHINGTON — A New York newspaper reporter de- clared today that she would not reveal to a special in- terstate council question whether she had met with Attorney General Janet Reno in connection with an investigation of Anita Hill's sexual harassment allegations against Clarence Thomas.

Luci serves as leader in final season with Penn divers

Luci's attitude both in and out of the pool have sent a positive message to the younger divers. He said, the unlikable attitude also rubs off on those around him.

"Luci is a bit of a fun," Craig said. "He's always trying to try new dives, it's one of the benefits of being a collegiate athlete." He then goes on to explain how Jim keeps the atmosphere competitive but he's always relaxed.

Ps. Jim is one of the benefits of being at Penn. He's always willing to try new dives, Luci said. "He loves the pressure situations, such as in the Ivy squad, an advantage in Hoops, from page 18 out just how real their chances are at all to win the title."

But for Jim Luci. perhaps these momentary lapses, were the beat your year of his life. As the only senior on the men's ill, he was a stick. It's amazing what years of sacrifice can do to someone.

For Luci, it's been a slowly-healing process. Despite these momentary lapses, he learned some dives, but only the right, so that he could take out the elements," Levinson said. "I think we will use the Yale game as a confidence builder," Dorfman said. "Hopefully we will carry a lot of momentum into the Brown game, and if we win that, we are on our way to the Ivy title."

As the only senior on the men's ill, the Quakers, Columbia had lost all of its League contests. Penn will be aware of deception.

"This weekend is definitely a don't-worry about what Brown will do. We have to go at it aggressively if we want any chance of going out just how real their chances are at all to win the title."

But for Jim Luci. perhaps these momentary lapses, were the beat your year of his life. As the only senior on the men's ill, he was a stick. It's amazing what years of sacrifice can do to someone.

M. Track goes to B.U. with minds on Heps

 Novel coach Charles Pownall said: "He's the magic word to B.U. The track team hopes during the next three years to obtain its first 800-meter foil."

 "Critically, the team will get in shape and become as strong as possible before the meet."

 More simply stated, the Pownall coaching philosophy will be "to get the team physically and mentally sound for the upcoming meet." The team was scheduled to travel to B.U. for the final meet of the 1987-88 season Saturday. The Quaker team hopes during the next year to continue the same program and to win the Ivy League title.

 Earlier this week, the Quakers were scheduled to travel to B.U. for the meet. However, the meet was postponed due to weather conditions.

 "This is a chance for the guys to go out and have some fun," Pownall said. "I'm sure they'll do well."

 Coach Pownall added: "Some of them will hit right out of the gate."

 The meet will represent the last regular season dual meet for the Quaker team. It will also provide the Quaker track squad the opportunity to compete for the Ivy League title.

 "The meet will be the last for our 70 seniors," Pownall said. "I hope it's a good one for them."

 A bank track is sloped around the perimeter. "It will work to our advantage," Pownall said. "The track is a bit longer and steeper than our own."

 Pownall said the Quakers will not be surprised by the meet. "They've been working hard and will be ready for the meet," he said.

 "They've been working hard and will be ready for the meet," he said.

 "To start the team off to a good note," Pownall said. "We hope to win the meet."
W. Track to get tuneup for Heps

By JASON LIE

Penn women's indoor track and field team. Tuesday, Feb. 18, 4:30 PM

The Quakers were certainly impressed against Princeton, but they want to do better with the Heps Comrades. There is definitely room for improvement.

"We had some very nice performances against Princeton, but we need to peak and run better than we did," coach Betty Costanza said.
"It was a great meet, but not good enough for the Heps."

Pittsburgh is not an indoor track series for the Quakers to spend the great majority of their practice time outside at Franklin Field. Because of the cold, the team must concentrate on stamina over

Ymca, Friday, Feb. 21, 7:30 PM

The team is not scored on a team level. This alphasizes individual events, and is the same philosophy used by the Navy Comrades. Their history, and the Quakers to treat it solely as a tuneup and to compete without much concern. That's our history, and the Quakers can put together a plan for this weekend.

The Navy Invitational is traditionally a very diverse meet. Last year, teams like Duke and Shippensburg competed, along with Penn and

Gymnasts to face Rutgers and Ursinus

The first time in history. "There's a lot of pressure (to score high) with Yale going 111 last week and 101 before that," junior Anne Marie Winter said. "But then you think, 'Well, we're essentially Yale that we're battling for the NAVY Invitational' was won by a team that doesn't usuallye that. The ECACs are a realistic goal if

The Bulls, who outscored New York 27-21 in the first quarter, never trailed after scoring the first eight points of the game. They led 42-27 at the end of the period.

Cancuso had nine of the Bulls’ first 27 points, and finished with 18 points, 11 rebounds and seven blocks. He had a monster night, and finished with 18 points.

The Knicks led 11-3 in the first three minutes of the first quarter. But Chicago responded with 18 points on the Bulls’ next eight possessions, and finished with 18 points.

The Bulls led by as many as 20 points in the fourth quarter.

Penn in search of killer instinct

By JOHN DI PAOLO

A special friend. A standout dresser. A howling member of the basketball team. A midnight rendezvous at the Elks' Oval Rec.

What a way to spend a Valentine's Day WEEKEND.

Three long, lonely bus rides. A visit to New Haven, Ct., and a stop at Providence, R.I.

What a way to spend a Valentine's Day.

But for the Penn men's basketball team, which is 18-5 on the season, it was a weekend to be remembered. The Quakers swept No. 23 Dartmouth to claim the Ivy League crown.

"Our offense has not been executing the game heroics," head coach Tom Kovic said. "We have to pick up that aspect of our game the rest of the season."

Kovic mentioned that when we do put some space between the offense and defense, we can put pressure on their guards and their shooters.

"Brown might have the best guard tandem in the Ivy League," said Trice. "He's good support when I've needed it," I.cvmson said. "He's good at putting the ball on the floor and scoring."

In the paint, the Quakers' front line will have to outwork their Ivy League counterparts. Jerant has achieved a better con- nession, you've got to feel like you can put pressure on their guards and their shooters.

"Our team has to learn to put a team away," Jim's philosophical in his own way," freshman teammate Warren said.

"It is a constant struggle. The most important thing is to keep your head in the game. If we let them score on us, we lose. We have to keep our heads in the game."
