Provo rejects performing arts theater plan
Students upset by decision

The Daily Pennsylvanian

Provo students rejected a proposal to build a performing arts theater at the University of Pennsylvania. The decision came after a heated debate that lasted several hours. The proposal, which was met with enthusiasm by some students, was ultimately voted down by a margin of 101 to 95. The decision was controversial, with some students arguing that the theater would be a valuable addition to the University's cultural offerings and others concerned about the cost and potential impact on the surrounding community.

SAC Finance committee members, recognizing the need to raise funds in order to support their various initiatives, proposed the construction of a new performing arts theater. The proposal would have cost approximately $25 million and would have included a state-of-the-art theater, a studio theater, and a variety of other performance spaces. The committee argued that the theater would have a positive impact on the University's artistic and cultural community, providing a much-needed venue for performances and events.

However, the proposal faced significant opposition from a group of students who were concerned about the cost and potential impact on the surrounding community. These students argued that the $25 million price tag was too high and that the money could be better spent on other initiatives. Some students also expressed concern about the potential impact on the surrounding community, arguing that the theater would increase traffic and noise in the area.

The debate was intense, with passionate arguments on both sides. Some students argued that the theater would be a valuable addition to the University's cultural offerings and would provide a much-needed venue for performances and events. Others argued that the $25 million price tag was too high and that the money could be better spent on other initiatives.

In the end, the decision was made to reject the proposal. While some students expressed disappointment with the outcome, others were pleased with the decision, arguing that the money could be better spent on other initiatives that would have a greater impact on the University's community.

The University's president, Dr. Alice Waters, expressed her support for the decision, stating that the University had made a careful and deliberative decision. She also thanked the students for their involvement in the debate and for their passion for the University's cultural offerings.

Provo students were divided in their reactions to the decision. Some expressed disappointment with the outcome, arguing that the theater would have been a valuable addition to the University's cultural offerings. Others were pleased with the decision, arguing that the money could be better spent on other initiatives that would have a greater impact on the University's community.

The debate over the performing arts theater proposal is likely to continue in the coming months, with many students and stakeholders expressing their views on the issue. The University's leadership will need to carefully consider the feedback and continue to engage with the community in order to make decisions that are in the best interest of all.

Beat poet Allen Ginsberg reads from ‘Kaddish’

Ginsberg read straight through the poem, stumbling over words at times, and pausing occasionally to sip his drink or cough.

‘This was a way of making up for that,’ he said.

But once he started reading, all traces of illness vanished. As he tightly grasped his copy of the poem with both hands, he spoke in a clear, strong voice. His deep, resonant voice filled the room, drawing the audience every few lines. Ginsberg’s speech was as if he were singing one of the lines in his distinct deep voice.

He read straight through the poem, pausing only over words of substance, and pausing occasionally to sip his drink, cough or wipe his face. At one point, he stopped, pulled out his handkerchief and returned it to his pants.

He concluded the piece with a voice rich in emotion and accent.

Ginsberg became increasing louder, and his speech was full of life.

He walked to the end of the stage, and returned to his seat, reading an epilogue to the poem.

Students said they were extremely impressed with Ginsberg’s performance.

Robert makes a valid point in his letter. However, I do believe that the president of the University of Pennsylvania is not the only one who should be held responsible for the situation. The Board of Trustees and the administration also have a role to play in ensuring the safety and security of students on campus. The Daily Pennsylvanian should continue to report on this issue and hold all parties accountable. ROBBIE CAMPBELL

Incorrect Cause

The To the Editor:

1. Are you accepting the idea that the word cause is being used in a different way than it is usually understood? Cause is usually understood to mean bringing about something by the action of one's will.

2. If the price of a good is a determined by the market forces of supply and demand, then why is it that the government does not impose a price control on all goods and services?

Wrestlers eager to seize Ivy lead

By TUSHAR BHAT

Bowlus, Reynolds and Sobeck— that's the team. The Penn wrestling team begins the Ivy League portion of their dual meet schedule this weekend with a road trip to Columbia. And for the first time in a while, they're going in with a bang.

While injuries have been a problem and expectations have been low, the wrestling team has been a pleasant surprise for the school. The team has picked up some of its top performers from the past few years like Steve Buhl and Jesse Lee. They hope to use this weekend's meet to show that they are ready for the Ivy League.

Penn's first meet of the season was against Columbia and the team performed well, losing 26-13. This weekend's meet will be against Princeton, who are ranked higher in the Ivy League.

Penn's wrestling team is ready to face Princeton and show that they are a force to be reckoned with in the Ivy League. They are looking forward to a strong performance and hope to bring home the win.
